An official in the W. C. T. U., who is evidently not so well-informed as she might or ought to be, writes to one of our Boston papers—which, by the way, prominently displays liquor advertisements—to know whether the organization can properly erect a building in Eureka Springs, Kan., and lease the property to the Masons, who might give banquets, or serve wines and liquors, and thus turn it into a secret drinking den. The paper answers, very properly, that if the W. C. T. U. have the slightest suspicion that their hall will be so used, they ought, under no possible consideration, to lease it to the Masonic organization. This Kansas W. C. T. U. needs to have some light flashed on its darkness from our polar star, the Cynosure. But if Miss Willard and other leading white-ribboners would accede to the wishes of a large and steadily increasing number of its members for the addition of an anti-secrecy department, there would soon be no union so ignorant as to entertain the proposal for a moment of renting its headquarters to a Masonic lodge.

The Bay State League is reported to have the largest number of claims against it of any of the defunct endowment orders. It will pay only 17 per cent dividend. The original supreme officers sold out and left the State. Their successors likewise disappeared, with the bookkeeper, and the receiver has found his task of restoring, in the chaos which their rascality and fraud has left behind them, by no means a sinecure. How much the destitution now prevailing among the unemployed might be ameliorated, could they have the millions back again which have been swallowed up in these swindling concerns! Insurance Commisioner Merrill, in his report to the Massachusetts Legislature, says that "with the collapse of the assessment endowment corporations there has arisen in the West, and elsewhere, a large number of quite similar schemes for sudden wealth." These can come into Massachusetts and fleece the people without any restriction in her statute laws. Theoretically, the people ought to know enough to profit by their sad experience; but, practically, there will always be a certain number of fools who will be caught by these glittering promises, and who should be protected from their own folly.

The Odd-fellows of Portland, Me., have lost some $5,000 through a defaulting secretary, who, after going to Canada, and staying long enough to spend all his money, has now returned. But he will neither be prosecuted nor arrested. So say the papers. This leniency is only in accordance with the promise to shield a brother Odd-fellow from the unpleasant consequences of his own "imprudence;" and, furthermore, the lodge does not like to figure in law-cases on account of the risk of being asked to reveal some of the valuable secrets of the lodge-room.

An Armenian paper, published at Tiflis, in the Caucasus, devotes a lengthy article to Mrs. Lucy Stone, giving an account of her early life, and an outline of the early and present status of woman suffrage in this country, as brought about through her heroic labors. Best of all, the Woman's Column tells us that the article in question has been copied into other Oriental journals, and has gone the rounds of the papers in Constantinople. It comments on the strangeness of the idea to an Oriental mind that a woman can be "great;" greatness being a quality it grants only to men. I fear that the Occidental mind sometimes errs in a similar manner, even in Boston, which has not to my knowledge a single statue in marble or bronze among those which adorn—or disfigure—her public squares, erected to one of her great women. Would not a traveler from the Orient, and perhaps nearer home, after noticing this remarkable circumstance, jump to the conclusion that we had no great women; or, at least, none to whom we grant the attribute of greatness? Now I am on this subject, I can but wish that the W. C. T. U. ladies at Music Hall, the other night, had refused to take part in a tableau like the "Babylonian Beauty Mart," where the fairest women were sold to the highest bidders. It may have been "a great hit," and very "artistic," but at best such scenes from a heathen land and age, which represent the sex under its most debased and degraded conditions, should not be resurrected by self-respecting Christian women, even in a tableau.

Mohammedans proselyting in New York, and Mormons in Massachusetts? What are we coming to? Two converts to the latter faith were lately baptized in Haverhill, Mass., through a hole cut in the ice; but the instinct of self-preservation will be likely to act as a check on much proselyting in the winter months, as even the fires of fanaticism may not always ward off the attacks of grip and pneumonia likely to result from such untimely exposure.

Gov. Greenhalge gave us a message rather above the average of such documents. His counsel to work for no-license in all the cities and towns is encouraging, even though in dealing with the temperance question one can see that he does not go as far as his own moral convictions would lead him, but has to stop short with his party, just this side of any radical cure for the evil he deplores. "There is no influence," he says, "which is so liable to disturb our moral and political welfare as that of the groggery and the saloon.... Political purity will be impossible so long as the influence of the sale and use of liquor plays so large a part in the discussion and solution of political questions."

Then why not apply the axe to the root of the tree and give us Prohibition with a big P? But it doesn't prohibit, say the leaders of both the old parties in one chorus. Apropos to this, there is a story that in Eastern Maine three dozen large hand-grenades, each holding about two gallons, came by freight, consigned to a fish-peddler. They were seized and opened, but each bottle was found to contain a chemical solution used in fire extinguishers. A more thorough examination, however, revealed the fact that each bottle had a false bottom, in which the whisky was hermetically sealed. Of course, to get at the liquor the bottle had to be broken, the neck and upper part being filled with a quart of the fire extinguisher to deceive the officials. When prohibition prohibits to the extent of making would-be rumsellers resort to such ingenious devices, it may fairly be voted a success—in Maine, or anywhere else.

It has been decided that Boston liquor-dealers can sell to parties in a prohibition State, like Maine, and collect their money, even though it is known that the purchasers mean to engage in its illegal sale, provided the sale was made and completed in this State. It looks to candid minds like one of those legal quibbles by which prohibition laws are too often made null and void.

The death of Elizabeth P. Peabody at the ripe age of ninety removes the last of that group of transcendentalists, devoted to plain living and high thinking, of which Emerson, Margaret Fuller, Alcott and Channing were the bright particular stars. That she learned Polish at the age of sixty, because of her interest in the struggle of that unhappy country for freedom, gives the keynote of her character. She was identified with the abolition movement, with woman suffrage and the higher education for women, though she was most famous as a pioneer in the kindergarten movement. Another proof that to be all one's life identified with some unpopular reform tends to longevity and keeps one young.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 17, 1894.

The debate on the tariff bill is now in a very interesting stage,—the proposal of amendments thereto—but as the final result, as far the House of Representatives is concerned, is regarded by all as the same—the passing of the bill—Secretary Carlisle's letter to Senator Voorhees, chairman of the Senate Finance committee, is attracting more attention from thoughtful people. His estimate that the deficiency will be in excess of $78,000,000 at the close of the present fiscal year is a convincing argument that something should at once be done by Congress, and he suggests that the "something" be an amendment to the specie resumption act of 1875, providing for an issue of three-per-cent bonds. There is much opposition in Congress to an issue of bonds, and Secretary Carlisle is not sanguine of the adoption of his suggestion, but he is fully determined that if Congress does not immediately provide for the necessities of the Treasury he will, under authority of the act of 1875, issue enough of four-per-cent bonds to meet the exigency.

There is a feeling of relief, both in and out of Congress, at the present status of the Hawaiian question. Congress can now take its time to consider the matter, without being in fear of getting news by every mail that blood had been shed in the effort to restore the queen. It is regarded as almost certain that Congress will declare in favor of non-interference.

There is scarcely a limit to the good that can be accomplished by one man of courage, particularly when that man occupies an official position. When the gamblers who had been driven out of New Jersey came here to carry on their nefarious calling, under the name of horse racing, the local authorities said they were powerless under the laws to prevent it, and the gambling was commenced without their raising any serious objection. Then U. S. District Attorney Birney declared that he would stop it, and with the very laws that the local officials had said would not do it. The gamblers did not believe him, so they decided to go on. He promptly had them arrested and indicted. They employed the finest legal talent that money could get—and, unfortunately, it can always get the best—and attacked the validity of the indictments in the courts. Yesterday the judge handed down his decision, declaring the indictments valid, and that betting on horse racing was gambling. This decision practically drives these gamblers out of the District of Columbia, and, temporarily at least, destroys the business of the pool-rooms in cities throughout the country based upon the races here, although the trials under those indictments will not take place for some weeks. This is a great triumph for moral reform, although it is lessened somewhat by the fear that the gamblers may succeed in their threat of bringing political influence to bear upon the President for the removal of this courageous District Attorney, because of his having dared to antagonize them.

The greatest public interest is being manifested in the coming series of Moody and Sankey meetings. Many prominent people, among them Vice President Stevenson, are personally taking part in the preliminary arrangements for them. The first public rehearsal of the grand chorus of 1,500 voices that is to lead the singing was held this week. Interest is added to these meetings by the fact that they will be the last conducted in America by Mr. Moody for some time, as at their close he goes to London, upon the invitation of English clergymen, including 183 of the Established Church, for a prolonged stay.

The Christian Endeavorers of this District are all busy preparing for their second annual convention, which is to be held on Friday and Saturday of this week, but they are not neglecting their work towards the selection of Washington as the meeting-place of the international gathering of 1896.

It is not often that a minister delivers the same sermon twice in one day in the same city, but Bishop Paret, of the P. E. church, did it last Sunday. This sermon was a powerful arraignment of the efforts that are now being made to have public money appropriated to sectarian schools, and it lost none of its effect from being delivered by a bishop of a church which believes in, and maintains to a considerable extent, parochial schools of its own; but does not seek public funds to do it with. The bishop's text was Matthew 22: 21—"Render therefore unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's; and unto God the things that are God's."

Are secular newspapers subsidized to support the liquor interests to any considerable extent? Mrs. Marion Baxter, of Michigan, in the course of an address delivered here on "Society as it Is," under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., made the distinct charge that in the State of Pennsylvania alone four hundred papers had been subsidized to support the liquor interests. Mrs. Baxter also reproved the churches for not taking more active measures for the suppression of the liquor traffic. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE EASTERN SECRETARY—PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

PHILADELPHIA HEADQUARTERS, }
457 N. 6th St., Jan. 18, 1894. }

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have met with nothing but success during the past week. Lectures have been well attended and a good number of names added to the Cynosure subscription list, as usual.

I spent Sabbath at Hatfield, where I addressed the Sabbath-school and preached the Word in the Mennonite church. At Emaus and Upper Milford I gave lectures to appreciative audiences.

At Vera Cruz, not far from the Upper Milford church, there is a lodge of men calling themselves "Eagles." They "nest," or hold meetings, over the cheese factory. A young man, who said he could not come to my lecture because he had to go to this lodge, said they only started last May and had 110 members. I asked what they did in the lodge. He replied: "I don't know; I have not been there very long already, but it is all founded on the Bible." I found the place in the Bible where the "Eagles" are spoken of (Matt. 24–28), and read it, with its connection, to my audience. [Read Matt. 24, beginning at the 23d verse.] The choice of their name is significant, when we remember that here is a warning. We are to look out for the false Christs coming in the last times.

Brethren N. Moyer, of Allentown, and Allen Gehman, of Vera Cruz, aided much in securing Cynosure readers. We look for large delegations of friends from this section to the convention.

I hope to report much, if not all, the program for next week's paper. Doubtless the president's call has reached you ere this.

A large number of ten-minute addresses from pastors and others are to be an interesting feature of the program. Our staunch friend, Josiah W. Leeds, expects to present a paper illustrative of vice seeking concealment. The subject of this paper will be "Where two Ways meet in the City of Brotherly Love."

I had a very pleasant visit, this afternoon, with Rev. F. W. Weiskotton, pastor of a large German Lutheran church in this city. He related some very thrilling experiences. Lodge men had tried to force him to recognize their heathen rites by union in burial services. Failing in this, they endeavored to make the public believe that he had lied regarding them. Their false claim was publicly exposed, and many left the lodge.

CORRESPONDENCE.

MORE "FACTS FROM WASHINGTON."

WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 17, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have just been reading in your excellent paper what "One who Knows" says about the Romanists in this city. I am so grateful to you for publishing that article that I must thank you for it.

I am not a stranger to what the Romanists are doing at the capital of our nation. What "One who Knows" has told you is true, but he has not told you all. I have lived in this city nearly ten years, and if God has opened my eyes at all, he has shown me that this nation is on the verge of ruin. Romanists and Masons rule this city, and their influence is extended far and wide. Our ministers are Masons, and how can we expect God to bless their labors? Most of them, too, join hands with the Romanists. Some of our most popular ministers attend Satolli's and Cardinal Gibbons' receptions.

Your correspondent says that nineteen Roman Catholics were promoted at the Bureau of Engraving and Printing in one day; but he does not tell yon why they were promoted. I will tell you how one Catholic woman was promoted there: One day she had some unpleasant words with her priest. (I think that he was exacting money from her.) She said: "Why, I have made sixteen converts for the church." The priest soon changed his manner toward her and said: "I'll have you promoted." She has since been converted to the Protestant faith, but is persecuted nearly to death by the priests. She is a woman of intelligence, and has had a long experience in the Romish church. She tells me that the priests have detectives on the streets and in the departments. She also tells me that a wealthy colored Catholic woman owns a large number of houses which are used as dens of prostitution, and that the profits—a part, if not all—go to the Romish church. Before this lady left the Catholics, she went to her priest and told him that it was wrong for him to receive money from such a source. He replied that it was none of her business how the money was obtained; that it was all right if it was used for the church. She then went to Cardinal Gibbons, who said the same thing, and also said: "We will have the Protestants' money, and we will have them, too." The colored woman knows no better.

I can tell you how one man retained his position in the Pension office. The Free Methodists were tearing down their old church and building another. We gave them the use of a room, meantime, in which to hold meetings. One of the leaders, who professed santification, was a clerk in the Pension office. To please his overseer, and retain his position, he left the Free Methodists, became a Roman Catholic, and is still in the Pension office.

When Satolli first came to this city, he went first to St. Augustine (the colored) church, and it was heralded through the colored men's papers. Our professing Christians have shut our church-doors to the colored people, and are letting the Romanists gobble them up. Their church-doors are always open to them. At a Catholic (colored) congress held here a few winters ago, one of the delegates proposed that the colored people should go into the Catholic church in a body, as that "was the only church that cared for them." But, as a rule, the Catholics hate the colored people. Most of our policemen are Catholics, and they shoot down the colored people like dogs, without any provocation whatever.

ANOTHER "ONE WHO KNOWS."

A BLIND PREACHER AND HIS WORK.

WHEATON, Ill., Jan. 19, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Rev. Almiron Smith, of No. 20, Elm St., Utica, N. Y., has been blind for many years. He first came to the notice of the Cynosure several years ago when pastor of the Free Methodist church at Saratoga Springs, where he welcomed the former editor of this paper, President J. Blanchard, to his pulpit for an address on the lodge. Mrs. Blanchard also became much interested in a tract work which Bro. Smith had already begun. He has since been located at Syracuse, Utica and other points, filling the Utica pastorate until the middle of October last, when he became conference evangelist, and Bro. Kendrick was called to the just-vacated pulpit from Freeport, Ill.

Though blind and a leader of soul-blind men, Bro. Smith is not of the class spoken of by our Lord; for he does not lead them into the ditch, but into the light of life. God has provided him a cheerful home and a noble wife, who is truly a help-meet for him. Here he continues his tract work, and one room neatly fitted with tables and shelving is used for this purpose. His publications cover a considerable range,—general religious themes, temperance, Romanism, the lodge, worldly fashions and amusements, etc. He also publishes note-heads, envelopes and postal-cards that preach the Gospel as they go to the ends of the earth.

The tracts against the lodge are four: one giving Mr. Moody's testimony, another Joseph Cook's, another showing the false religion of Masonry, from the terse and forceful pen of the late Rev. B. T. Roberts, of the Earnest Christian. The fourth is by Bro. Smith himself. These are all very attractively printed and in pages small enough for envelopes. The profits of this tract work go to missions.

This enterprise deserves a grateful mention from the Cynosure, since Bro. Smith and his wife very heartly aided the State Convention in Utica. They brought a quantity of tracts for distribution, entertained delegates, and participated in the meeting with excellent spirit and effect. Friends of our reform passing through Utica will find in Bro. Smith a friend with whom they may pass a very agreeable and interesting hour.

FREE SPEECH AND A FREE PRESS.

CHICAGO, Jan. 18, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The Constitution of the United States provides that the liberty of speech and of the press shall not be abridged—that is, not diminished or suppressed. The Constitution of the State of New York (and possibly of other States) declares that every one shall have liberty to speak and write at will, being responsible only for a malicious abuse of that liberty.

Free speech and free press are, in a measure, the safeguards of our own people, or any other, whose government is based on the equality of all persons under the law, because the majority rule. But much depends upon the character of those who compose the majority. If it comprises the best elements of society—those who are good citizens, law-abiding, peaceful supporters of the true interests of their government, their speeches and presses will be so likewise. The only danger arises when the wicked rule. Then liberty of speech and of the press become like firebrands thrown into a field of grain fully ripened for the harvest.

Ordinarily, if any individual, by his speech or writing, becomes dangerous to the best interests of his country, or of the community, it is a public duty to restrain him by all reasonable methods. Nitric acid may be harmlessly used in several departments of domestic manufactures, with excellent effect, and without restriction; yet no one is allowed to go into our streets, throwing it about at random, to the detriment of any person's features or dress. So, when a printed sheet becomes an enemy to the public weal by its menaces of public purity, or the welfare of the people as a whole, or as individuals, its suppression becomes a public necessity.

But the method of such suppression becomes a problem, owing to the unlimited freedom guaranteed to the tongue and press by the Constitution. It seems certain, however, that the powers of the Constitution never contemplated that gross abuses of so important a privilege should go unpunished, although it provides for the infliction of no penalty. Hence the State laws step in to regulate the freedom of the tongue and press, and make them responsible to the injured parties. So slander and libel become criminal to a degree that prosecution, conviction and awards of damages to the injured parties follow such abuse.

But so far as reforms of social and political evils are concerned, the platform and the press, in this republican government, are positive blessings as educators of the people; and every effort of the people to purify and elevate the work of these great engines of progress is a legitimate duty and object of pursuit.

Public opinion should itself be pure, and then the press and the platform should also be pure. If they are not, each is to blame; and there is no greater curse on earth than a corrupt people, a corrupt press and a corrupt pulpit.

And there is too much corruption, in these days, among all three. BURTON.

THE HELP OF THE LODGE.

BURLINGTON, Iowa, January, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—A case has recently come under my observation which illustrates the boasted helpfulness of the lodge. A professional man, who united with a certain church, and also with the Masons upon the advice of the rector of the church which he joined, has recently come to want. He has been compelled to take work in the mines as a common day-laborer, at wages insufficient to maintain his family. Through a slight bodily infirmity, he is incapacitated to some extent for manual labor.

Now why does not his lodge help him in such a time as this? It positively does not. He has been compelled to seek assistance among his relatives, who are opposers of the whole lodge system, and whose prayers he has despised.

If there is such untrammeled benevolence in the Masonic lodge as Masons would have us believe, why are its votaries forced to such humiliating circumstances as this?

The truth is that, like quack-nostrums and fortune-tellers, the lodge system feeds upon the duplicity of men. It calls attention to one fulfillment of its claims, and studiously hides the ninety and nine failures.

* * * * * * *

"Well, then, you do not believe that the lodge renders any help to its members?"

As to that, I am hardly prepared to say it. I am afraid that the facts would hardly bear me out. I feel, some way, that the lodge does not help those who are in tight places, and yet this forcible illustration of lodge aid would seem to say that it does help.

About one year ago, in the same town referred to above, a minister of the largest Protestant denomination in the place was unfortunate enough to be found in the middle of the night in a house of ill-fame. The police, on their regular infernal revenue collecting tours, recognized this man. They were Catholics and "pulled" him. Money, undoubtedly, kept his name from the police court records. His official members were apprised of the facts in the case. Immediately a congregation was wanting a minister. The "tongue of scandal"(?) got started. But the preacher was a great light in the lodge. One of the dirtiest journals in the city came out condemning the practice of evil speaking, quoted Scripture as though it had never passed through a political campaign, and referring to the case of this minister, said: "Let him that is not guilty cast the first stone." His brethren in the lodge, and sisters in the Rebekah, kept silence, and through the efforts of some force or another he was retained in apparently good standing in the church until a successor came on. He was then transferred to California, and immediately made an editor of one of the leading Western journals of his church.

I am hardly prepared to say that the lodge does not help. WILBUR N. COFFEE.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different

Aspects. By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H.

SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

LODGE NOTES.

(From secret society papers.)

It is asserted that every President of the United States since the war has been an Odd-fellow except Cleveland.

San Francisco Masonic lodges, it appears from the Trestle Board, admit colored men to equal membership with the whites.

Walla Walla, Wash., is truly an Odd-fellow town. Grand Secretary Shaw makes a boast that they have an Odd-fellow for every two voters, and no other town in the United States can show such a record.

An open letter from the pen of Past Grand Sire Nicholson, published in the Siftings, states that a lodge in Pennsylvania has asked for a dispensation allowing them to initiate members at $2 50 per head. They claim that the sum of $5 as fixed by the Grand Lodge of that jurisdiction is too high. In replying, Bro. Nicholson gives them a well deserved rebuke, and advises that men who think five dollars too high a fee, be informed that the order does not want them.

It is stated that all but five of the signers of the Declaration of American Independence were Freemasons. Another account says that all but two were Freemasons. Also that of the fifty-six signers fifty-five were Protestants, and only one (Charles Carroll, of Carrollton, Maryland), was a Roman Catholic. Also, that George Bancroft, in his History of the United States, Vol. V, page 474, says that the Irish Parliament, composed of nearly all papists, "heard of the rebellion with abhorrence," and donated four thousand men to put it down." It is quite evident there were no Freemasons among the majority of that parliament.

One of the prominent Odd-fellows of Kentucky has a beautiful little girl about 5 years old. A short time ago she was sitting on his lap with a hand glass before her. She looked at her father a moment, then looked at herself, and turned to her mother: "Mamma," she inquired, "did God make me?"

"Yes, daughter."

"Did he make papa, too?"

"Yes."

Then she took another look in the glass at herself. "Well," she said thoughtfully, "he is doing a great deal better work lately, isn't he?"—Three Links.

The tortures of dyspepsia, the sufferings of scrofula, the agonizing itch and pain of salt rheum, the disagreeable symptoms of catarrh, are removed by Hood's Sarsaparilla.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, JANUARY 25, 1894.

STUDENT FRATERNITIES.

It is known to all thoughtful observers of college life that during the past few years there has been a marked increase in the effort put forth by the lodges to influence the schools of our country. This has appeared in the frequent notices of meetings of the various Greek-letter societies in our cities, and in many other ways. It is a token of the resolution of forces on this question which is going forward throughout our country. The lodges are inspired by Satan, and he comprehends the power of educated young men and women, whether the church does or not.

Respecting these fraternities, we desire at this time to speak of those things which are peculiar to themselves rather than of objections which are common to all secret clans, cliques, rings, and conspiracies. In the first place the student is a young man; he is in the formative period of life; he will ordinarily carry with him through his active career that upon which he settles during his college course. It is manifest that such a person will be more helpful to a good cause, or a more powerful aid to a bad one, simply from the fact that he is young and has years before him in which to labor.

In the second place, he is to be an educated man. A large per cent of the Masons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, etc., are so illiterate that they can with difficulty stumble through the little catechism which these orders provide as the intellectual food for their members. These men are oftentimes active, ambitious and aspiring. They love office, and the titles by which they are designated are very agreeable to them. The educated man, however, is much more influential in shaping society. He may not be so good a ward-politician but he has in the end far more force in determining the course of events. If any man is to be spoiled by secret associations, it is to be desired that he should not be one of the leaders of thought among his fellows.

Third, this leadership, which is natural to the educated man, comes out clearly in the fact that the ministers, lawyers, physicians, and statesmen of the country are very largely from the students of our colleges and universities. If these men become devotees of the lodge, they will carry with them, not simply their personal influence but very largely the force of the organization or class to which they belong. Men change, but institutions remain and grow. It is an evil that an individual should become attracted by the secret advantages and regalia and titles of lodges; it is worse that an institution like the church or the bar or the legislature should be harnessed to the dark chariot of such organizations.

Fourth, the student-class is a most powerful one in which to labor; most young men are naturally frank, open-hearted, generous, and public spirited; it is not difficult for them to despise meanness even if it is strong and rich, or to respect courage and faith even when it is poor and despised; it is not natural for them to do mean things for the purpose of self-exaltation and rivalry. All the things which secret societies naturally develop in human character, young men naturally hate. The appetite for these things is like that for tobacco or for whisky—one which has to be acquired, and one which is almost unacquirable if they understand the dark and evil tendency of the orders. There must be craft and deceit used in order that the young man should delight in the habits of thought and traits f character which are developed by secret lodges.

Fifth, we who are seeking to withstand and remove the lodges from our country have not devoted so much attention to our schools as would have been wise. The self-sacrificing labors of our friend and brother, Rev. S. F. Porter, and the excellent work done by Rev. H. L. Kellogg and the association of seminary and college men which he formed, have been greatly honored of God.

We should push along the lines indicated by these brethren as rapidly as may be, and should expect to secure for the cause of openness and fair dealing the large and powerful class of young men and women now attending American colleges. It has been cheering to learn that more than one hundred of our American colleges now forbid the organization of secret societies among their young people. The Baptist University of Chicago sacrificed a great opportunity when in place of forbidding such organizations, they advised against them.

Secret societies never stay away from a place which they covet because they are advised not to enter it; and that university, in its second year, has already begun to reap the natural results of secret associations among its students.

We believe that there is ample reason for encouragement in respect to this line of work, and that the language of our heavenly Father to all who care for the future of our schools and colleges is, to be full of courage and go forward.

COLLEGE SECRET SOCIETIES.

The testimonies which we publish in to-day's Cynosure come to us fresh from seats of learning, from persons who know whereof they testify, and who have formed their observations and opinions from that best of all teachers—actual experience with the evils of college fraternities.

One feature of these societies, which is dwelt upon by one or more of our special contributors, deserves particular attention, since it fully confirms the statement made by President Hitchcock, in his "Reminiscences of Amherst College" (p. 320), in which he says of the societies, secret and anti-secret, in that institution:

"These, at different periods, have been fruitful sources of excitement, jealousy and heart-burning among the students and towards the faculty. The secret societies would of course have little prestige were they not strongly exclusive, so as in fact to leave out a majority of the students, nor unless those selected embraced the elite as to scholarship. But the majority thus passed by, or rather as they would regard it, made the mud-sills on which these societies rested, would not be very well contented in such a position, and the same faculty that had granted permission for the formation of the secret societies could not refuse the application for one of a contrary character. But this subjected them to the jealousy of the secret societies. There would be a desperate struggle among the students to obtain the leading men in the classes for the different societies, and they would ere long come to regard this matter as one of the most important interests in college."

At one time Amherst College had 268 students, of whom 126 were secret society men, and 142 were not. Of the forty college prizes given, the former received thirty-one—more than three-fourths of the whole, while they numbered less than one-half. This incident is confirmation of the power of these secret coalitions as affecting the educational standards in colleges and universities.

That which we print to-day might be greatly increased by additional evidence from various sources; but sufficient is given in such trustworthy form as to condemn the existence of these mischievous organizations, and class them with the ancient heathen, whose barbarism they emulate.

THE SECRET LODGE SYSTEM.

According to recent official reports from the various Grand Lodges, there are, in the United States and Canada, 4,136,375 members of recent lodges. Of these the Freemasons are the most numerous—746,464. This does not include dimitted Masons, of whom there are probably 100,000, and who are Masons, to all intents, as much as the others.

Next in order are the Odd-fellows, who number 722,885. This does not include colored Odd-fellows, nor those who are "non-financial."

Then come the Knights of Pythias, 413,934 strong.

These four millions of voters constitute one in five of the entire population entitled to the elective franchise in the United States and Canada. Members of these orders hold more than one-half of the offices of trust and profit in these countries, and are in a position to greatly influence the legal and social status of the people among whom they are found.

However widely these orders may differ from each other, they are all alike in certain particulars. (1) They are all agreed in regarding the covenant of secrecy as of paramount obligation, and that for the "initiate" to reveal any of the real or pretended secrets of the order is an offense deserving the severest retribution. (2) They are alike in insisting that each order may regard its own interests of superior importance, whether such interests are in harmony with, or opposed to the general good of society. In other words, these orders educate men in selfishness and to seek the interests of a class, rather than the well-being of the whole. (3) These orders unequally yoke together believers with unbelievers, in brotherhoods which are not in Christ, and which are not entered into in his name. Nearly all of them have a religious worship, in which all the members are expected to unite, and without any reference to their personal faith. Such worship, we need not say, cannot be acceptable to God.

Nearly all these lodges have chaplains, who may be chosen from any members of the order, and without any reference to their personal relation to Christ, or whether their prayers shall be true worship or a solemn mockery.

It follows that these orders, so great in numbers and so potent in influence, are a terribly perverting force, socially, politically and religiously, and that it is the duty of all Christians and of every good citizen to oppose them by every legitimate method.

THE LORD'S HAND IN OUR REFORM.

Since the exciting days that followed the murder of William Morgan by Masons, in 1826, continuing through several ensuing years, and lasting until other reforms of equal importance absorbed public attention, the anti-secrecy crusade has never achieved great popularity. It has had to contend, on the contrary, with determined opposition (1) from the lodges, and (2) from bodies of Christians who either belonged to the lodges or, if they did not, were willing, for various reasons, to fellowship with those who did. This is the nature and ground of the warfare in which the National Christian Association has been engaged ever since its organization. Sometimes this opposition has been very bitter, tinctured with malevolence and abuse, while our supporters, although they include the very purest and best men in the nation—statesmen, educators and ministers of the Gospel, have been comparatively few in numbers. But they have been sincere, earnest and hopeful in maintaining their position against the lodge; and although secret societies of all kinds have greatly increased, the anti-secrecy reform has never retroceded one step; and to-day it is as hopeful, as aggressive and as earnest as at any time during its existence.

There must be—there is—a cause for this unflinching maintenance of the unpopular principles which gave it birth. It is not, only, that the best men in the nation have stood by it firmly under every discouragement engendered by the opposition that met it on every hand. There is a deeper—a higher—a stronger source from which it has always received a willing support—and that is, in the lauguage of Nehemiah, "the hand of my God which was good upon me."

This is the secret of whatever of success has been achieved in this reform. Starting out with the few expositions of Morgan and Bernard as material upon which to found an intelligent opposition to the secret evils of the lodge, the Association to-day controls correct expositions of about fifty modern degrees of Freemasonry, all of Odd-fellowship, all of the Knights of Pythias, and enough of all other rituals of similar societies to make their hidden designs perfectly apparent to all classes of readers. With our literature, comprising the complete lodge-work from their own secret books; the experiences and expositions of seceders from all secret societies; and the close analyzation of the whole system of the secret works of darkness, by intelligent Christians, we have a panoply of strength, founded on invincible truth, that no man can successfully sneer at or refute.

How has this been accomplished? In two ways: By the secession of honest men from lodges, and by rituals obtained from adherents of the lodges, without prejudice to their standing in their respective fraternities. As the movements of the Syrian army were known beforehand by the King of Israel through the instrumentality of Elijah, so the secrets of the lodge have been correctly divulged to us, by the chosen instruments of the Lord. We may as well believe and acknowledge it; and we may safely add, with Nehemiah: "The God of heaven, he will prosper us; therefore we his servants will arise and build." "There is nothing hidden which shall not be manifested;" not even the secrets of Freemasonry; and it is by these revelations of an overruling Providence that we are enabled to understand and explain to others the snares and tactics of the enemy. By the power of God, also, we are enabled to meet and overcome every argument and device that secret societies, aided and abetted by Satan, can bring in defence of these stubborn works of darkness.

Let us, with Paul and his fellow-voyagers, "Thank God and take courage."

FEMALE COLLEGE SOCIETIES.

Statistics of a recent date inform us that there are to-day about 6,500 women graduates and undergraduates of higher institutions of learning in the United States who are members of Greek-letter secret societies. In this number members of societies established at only a single institution are not included; but those enumerated belong to organizations which are intercollegiate in character. A year ago it was stated, however, that nearly all the higher grade colleges for women exclusively, prohibited the existence of secret societies among their students.

When the co-education of the sexes at colleges first became popular, the male students, members of the Greek secret fraternities, received girls with scant favor and discouraged their attempts to unite with these societies. This coolness of their reception, it is alleged, aroused the energies of the female students and led to the organization of their own secret sisterhood. To-day these college sisterhoods, similar in all essentials to the male fraternities, are fully recognized by their respective institutions of learning, and their evil influences, as shown in the testimonies on another page, is quite as harmful as in the older and sterner societies. They differ little from those of the young men. They have their grips and passwords and mysterious ceremonies behind bolted doors, and there is the same spirit and motive manifested in their secret work. Some of these sisterhoods have a "literary" basis; others, a social design; but, either single or united, the desire for supremacy over those who do not join them is the ruling element.

The oldest and largest of these secret female societies in colleges is the Pi Beta Phi, which was first organized in 1867 among the girl-students in Monmouth college, at Monmouth, Illinois. The following year, it was followed by the "I. C. Sorosis" in the Iowa Wesleyan University. Within the next fifteen years ten more chapters were formed in various educational institutions of the West. In 1883 the name was changed to Pi Beta Phi fraternity. Since then active chapters have been established in the order mentioned at Knox College, Galesburg, Ill.; York College, Nebraska; Callanan College, Iowa; University of Colorado, Boulder; Hastings College, Nebraska; University of Denver, Hillsdale College, Michigan; Franklin College, Indiana; University of Michigan, Columbian University, Washington, D. C.; Ohio University, University of Minnesota, Sophie Newcombe College, New Orleans, and Swarthmore College, Pennsylvania. Thus it will be seen that a total of twenty-nine chapters have been established. The parent chapter at Monmouth was legislated out of existence by a decree of the faculty prohibiting secret fraternities among students at that institution. Three other chapters have also gone to untimely graves, leaving twenty-one undergraduate chapters. The total membership is about 1,800. The fraternity is thoroughly organized. Subordinate to the Grand Council, of which Emma Harper Turner, of Washington, was president, are four provincial organizations, with a president over each. The badge of the fraternity is a gold arrow, and a quarterly magazine, the Arrow, is published by the Michigan Beta Chapter at Ann Arbor. The fraternity has adopted wine and blue as its colors, and the carnation as its flower. It has also a flag and a yell.

Kappa Alpha Theta is one of the largest of the college sisterhoods. The Alpha chapter of the Kappa Alpha Theta was formed at Indiana Ashbury, now De Pauw, University, in January, 1870. A total membership of 1,300, and nineteen chapters scattered over twelve States, including California, are evidence of its aggressive influence.

Next to the Pi Beta Phi in point of numbers comes Kappa Kappa Gamma, which has 22 chapters and about 1,600 members. The Alpha chapter was formed in October, 1870, at Monmouth College, and of course suffered the same fate as the others at that college. This fraternity is also divided into provinces and governed by a Grand Council. The chapters are located at Boston, St. Lawrence, Syracuse, Cornell, Ohio, Wooster, Indiana, De Pauw, Butler, Wisconsin, Illinois, Wesleyan, Northwestern, Minnesota, Iowa, Kansas, Nebraska and Missouri Universities, and Buchtel, Alleghany, Hillsdale and Adrian Colleges.

The Delta Gamma fraternity is of Southern birth, having originated at the University of Mississippi, at Oxford, in 1872. For some years its membership was mainly in the South. Charters for new chapters were granted rather promiscuously until 1883, and as a result eight of the chapters that had been established had died before that date. With the convention held in 1883, however, a new life in the fraternity began. The fraternity now has fourteen active chapters in eleven different States, with a total membership of between six hundred and seven hundred. The parent chapter at Oxford is now extinct.

The Alpha Phi fraternity was founded at Syracuse University in 1872. It enjoys the distinction of having been the first woman's fraternity to build a chapter house. That fact may have helped to create the impression that has gone abroad that Alpha Phi is the most wealthy of the Greek sisterhoods. The total membership is now about 500, with active chapters at Syracuse, Northwestern, Boston, De Pauw, Cornell, Minnesota and Michigan Universities and the Woman's College at Baltimore, and alumnæ chapters in Boston, Chicago and Syracuse.

In November, 1874, Alpha chapter of the Gamma Phi Beta sisterhood was formed at Syracuse, N. Y. It was projected and inaugurated while Bishop E. O. Haven, of the M. E. church, was Chancellor of the Syracuse University. His daughter was one of the charter members. It has always been very conservative, and, as a consequence, has only five chapters and 377 members. The chapters are located at Syracuse, Michigan, Wisconsin, Boston, and Northwestern Universities. No honorary or associate members are admitted.

The youngest of the college secret sisterhoods is Delta Delta Delta, or, as it is familiarly known, the "Tri-Delta." It was organized in Boston in the fall of 1888; has seven chapters and about 250 members. These chapters are located at Iowa State University, Simpson College, Indianola, Ia.; Knox College, Galesburg, Ill.; Adrian College, Adrian, Mich.; St. Lawrence University, Canton, N. Y., and the University of Cincinnati.

The foregoing facts and figures are derived from statistics published about a year ago. Some few changes may have occurred; but these statements will serve, in a general way, to illustrate the history and growth of these female Greek societies.

—A note from Pres. Blanchard affords us an agreeable opportunity to mention that the winter term of Wheaton College is opening very pleasantly, and that the tokens are that this year is to be one of unusual success in all the departments of its work.

—To-night (Thursday) Prof. Graham Taylor and fifty students, from the Chicago (Congregational) Theological Seminary, meet with the Salvation Army at the Princess Rink, 558 West Madison St., in this city, for a union meeting. The rink should be crowded.

—We print, to-day, the official call for the approaching Pennsylvania Anti-secrecy Convention at Philadelphia. It is a stirring document, and, in connection with the Eastern Secretary's letter, on another page, indicates an interesting and important gathering. We expect to publish the entire program in next week's issue.

—A card from Pacific Grove, Cal., reports a grand celebration of the 273d anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims on Plymouth Rock, in 1620, at the Mayflower church, Rev. E. S. Williams, pastor. The writer adds: "We welcome the veteran Rev. S. F. Porter here. Please tell friends that here is a good place not only for an M. E. summer camp, but for disciples all the year."

—The day of prayer for colleges, Thursday, Jan. 25th, will be observed at Wheaton this year in the following manner, God willing: At ten o'clock in the morning there will be preached the annual sermon of the day of prayer for colleges. At two o'clock in the afternoon there will be a prayer-service, and again at seven-thirty o'clock in the evening. All friends of the college who can make it convenient to be present at any or all of these meetings are kindly and earnestly invited to be present.

—The Governor of New York, in his recent message to the Legislature, presents this encouraging view of the status of the free public schools in that State: "The number of children attending the common schools during the year 1893 was 1,083,228, an increase of 10,135 over the previous year. The number of children of school age was 1,892,388, showing that 809,160 children, nearly half the children of school age, were educated in private or parochial schools, or were not in school at all. The total amount expended for public schools during the year was $21,901,678.72, an increase of $767,162.98 over the amount expended in the previous year. The larger part of this sum, of course, was raised by local taxation." The Governor also recommends that the State encourage, by all proper means, the efficiency of the common-school system, and adds: "Our free schools should be the first care of the State and the object of wise and liberal legislation." It would be interesting to know just how many children were not in school at all.

—Our esteemed friends and co-workers, the original organization of the United Brethren in Christ—now known as "Conservatives," in opposition to the "Liberal" seceders—are rejoicing in a recent decision by the Michigan State Supreme Court, sustaining their rights under the old church constitution, in accordance with the judgments of other courts rendered in their behalf. These people are our people in the anti-secrecy reform; and as they remain true to the first principles of their organization, and have suffered loss in membership and property because of their opposition to all secret societies, they have our congratulations upon their success. The Christian Conservator furnishes the following summary of decisions already made in this unhappy division. (The "majority" signifies the "Conservatives"): "There have been four decisions of State Supreme Courts: those of Indiana, Oregon, Pennsylvania and Michigan, two of which have been in favor of each side, while there have been but two decisions of lower courts in Indiana, one on each side; but one in Pennsylvania, in favor of the majority; two in Michigan, one on each side; one in Oregon, in favor of the majority; three in Ohio, one in Illinois, one in Missouri and one in Virginia. Those in Ohio, Illinois and Missouri were for the majority, while the one in Virginia was for the minority. There has also been a decision by Judge Taft, of Ohio, in the United States Circuit Court, which was in favor of the minority."

Bro. Weiskotton has consented to address the convention. No one who possibly can should fail to hear him relate this thrilling experience.

Rev. C. Elofson, pastor of the Swedish Lutheran church, Philadelphia; Rev. N. B. Grubb, pastor of the Mennonite church, also of this city, and Rev. J. T. Cameron, pastor of the Free Methodist church, at Allentown, Pennsylvania, are among those who expect to give ten-minute addresses.

I trust that all friends from a distance, who expect to attend, and all churches appointing delegates, will notify me at their earliest convenience, so that entertainment may be provided. I should be glad to hear from those wishing programs for distribution. State how many you can likely use to advantage, please.

All letters should be sent to Philadelphia Headquarters, 457 N. 6th St. Don't forget to pray much that God may honor this gathering by making it a blessing to many. Yours in the work,

W. B. STODDARD.

THE HOME.

IN PERFECT PEACE.

Like strains of music, soft and low,
That break upon a troubled sleep,
I hear the promise old and new,
God will his faithful children keep
"In perfect peace."

From out the thoughtless, wreck-strewn past,
From unknown years that silent wait,
Amid earth's wild regret there comes
The promise with its precious freight,
"In perfect peace."

Above the clash of party strife,
The surge of life's unresting sea,
Through sobs of pain and songs of mirth,
Through hours of toil it floats to me,
"In perfect peace."

It stills the questionings and doubts,
The nameless fears that throng the soul,
It speaks of love unchanging, sure,
And evermore its echoes roll
"In perfect peace."

"In perfect peace." O loving Christ!
When falls death's twilight gray and cold,
And flowers of earth shall droop and fade,
Keep thou thy children as of old,
"In perfect peace."

And through the glad eternal years,
Beyond the blame and scorn of men,
The hearts that served thee here may know
The rest that passeth human ken,
"Thy perfect peace."

CHILD-STORIES.

The hour had come for retiring, and a sweet little girl was bidding good-night to the family, while her kind nurse stood waiting for her at the parlor-door. She climbed her father's knee to tell him how much she loved him, and gave many kisses to the baby. Her mother, as she embraced her, whispered: "You will not forget your prayers."

"Oh, no, mamma dear, I could not sleep without saying good night to my kind Father in heaven. I love to say good night to God."

A fair little girl, of a gentle spirit, won the attention, or love, of all who saw her. A visitant, who had taken her upon his knee, told her of the loneliness of his home, where were no children to cheer him on his return; and appealing to her pity, asked if she would not go and live with him. Throwing back her clustering curls, and looking in his face, with a tender serious expression, she replied:

"God gave me to this house."

The original narrator of this story beautifully adds: "The tone was simple as the words, and the silvery voice was childhood's; yet, for a moment, it seemed as if wafted from a far-off world, where only angels dwell. A sober brightness, as of something profound and holy, passed over the meditative mood of the dwellers in that house, and every heart in it swelled with gratitude for the great God's gift."

A pair of twin sisters were so much alike that it was difficult to distinguish them. Their little hearts were also blended in the sweetest love. Dressed always alike, they might usually be seen, hand in hand; and wherever one was, you might be sure that the other was not very far away.

When old enough to attend school, they sat side by side, studied from the same book, wrote the same copy, shaded with their pencils the same flower, warbled the same song, in the same key. They enjoyed the instructions of a very faithful teacher, who sometimes, to test the thorough preparation of her pupils, called them to recite separately. On such an occasion, one of the twins having neglected her lesson, mistook and faltered. Tears started to her eyes, and the embarrassment of betraying ignorance, convulsed her with shame. Just at that crisis the teacher was called out.

The other sister, seated upon her bench, well-prepared with her lesson, sympathized in all the suffering of her second self. Her breast heaved, and her cheek was suffused with crimson. Springing to the side of the tried one, she forced her backward into her seat, with a rapidity that overcame resistance, and stood up in her place. The teacher returned, resumed her examination, and found every question answered promptly, and with perfect correctness. At first she was surprised, yet supposed a little interval had enabled the pupil, by reflection, to collect her thoughts, or possibly to review those points of the lesson in which she was most deficient. But the expression of an approbation which was not fairly earned rankled in the consciences of these pure-minded sisters. They could not be happy, thus to deceive their teacher.

Requesting to be permitted to stay after school, they approached her with tears, and confessed what they had done.

"I could not bear to see my poor sister in such pain," said the sweet one who rescued her. "Forgive us, we are but one," said their little voices, in unison.

"God bless you," said their kind preceptress; "may you be one in heaven."

"Oh! dear grandmother," said a little boy, as he kissed his new-born sister that lay in her arms, "I must never be naughty any more, now we've got this baby. For you know, if I am naughty, she'll learn to be naughty of me, and that will be bad for mother."

The grandmother, perceiving the force of the argument, strove to deepen it in the child's mind. He gazed earnestly at the face of the babe, and wonderingly felt its tiny hands and feet, till its beauty and helplessness seemed to call forth an overflowing tenderness. When his mother approached, he ran to meet her, and clasping his arms around her knees, exclaimed passionately:

"Mother, mother, give me that baby for my own."

Not immediately comprehending his state of feelings, she made some inquiries. But all the answer she could obtain, was the repetition:

"Oh, mother! say it shall be my baby! Will you give it to me for my own baby, always?"

Moved by his tears, she answered in the affirmative. Then a great happiness, and a singular sense of responsibility entered into him. To watch over the child, seemed his business and pleasure. When he saw his mother so patient in nursing it, so attentive to its little ailments, he never failed to thank her for taking care of his baby. When any sudden willfulness of childhood came over him, he would check it by saying, "Baby sees me. Baby hears me. It will not do."

So, between his desire of being an educator, and his heightened gratitude to his mother for her care over his child, a wonderful change came over the boy, who had formerly been quick-tempered and selfish, as if the strong brotherly love, coalescing with the grace of God, had given him a new heart, and power to lead a new life.

REWARDS OF SECRET PRAYER.

Among the open rewards of secret prayer we would specify presence of mind and composure of spirit. There are some persons of a calm temperament who pass sedately through every scene, and are seldom taken by surprise. They are persons of ready wit, and exhaustless resources, and constant self-command. But there are others, fearful and foreboding, easily stunned and easily agitated. They are perpetually apprehending a lion in the street, and go about any new undertaking with as much anxiety as would suffice for the most arduous enterprise.

Prayer calms and fortifies the mind, and so prepares it for the rapid incidents and sudden emergencies of the day. But it does more than this. Just as you may have noticed, those who move in the highest circles, and who are accustomed to the loftiest society, they not only continue calm and collected when others are embarrassed or unhinged, but in circumstances of delicacy or distress to others, by a certain high-born address, a certain conscious felicity, they not only save themselves from awkwardness, but give a happy extrication to all around them.

So there are certain persons belonging to the peerage of the faithful—men of as old a family as Enoch's—princely natures, who are wont to converse with the King of kings; men who, in their walks with God, have learned the happy art of possessing their own souls and tranquilizing the souls of others. Their hearts are fixed, and when they hear of evil tidings they not only are not themselves afraid, but their assurance comforts and composes others. And, beyond all this, the man of prayer is preternaturally prompted and strengthened from above. Like the first disciples, he needs to take no thought how or what he shall say or do, for in the hour of exigency the Holy Ghost will teach him.

When Nehemiah was enabled to put the case of his people so touchingly to the Assyrian monarch, the pathos of his statement, the unwonted kindness of the king, and the prompt concession of his prayer, were the open reward of a secret ejaculation. (Neh. 2:4–6.) When his friends asked the great physician Boerhaave how he could possibly go through so much work from day to day, and pass tranquilly through so many fretting scenes, he told them that his plan was to devote the first hour of every morning to prayer and meditation on the Word of God.—Rev. James Hamilton, D.D.

WONDERFUL PRESENCE OF MIND.

It was in India. Dinner was just finished in the mess room, and several English officers were sitting about the table. Their bronzed faces had a set but not unkindly look common among military men. The conversation at best had not been animated, and just now there was a lull, as the night was too hot for small talk. The major of the regiment, a clean-cut man of fifty-five, turned toward his next neighbor at the table, a young subaltern, who was leaning back in his chair with his hands clasped behind his head, staring at the ceiling.

The major was slowly looking the man over, from his handsome face down, when, with a sudden alertness and a steady voice, he said:

"Don't move, please, Mr. Carruthers. I want to try an experiment with you. Don't move a muscle."

"All right, major," replied the subaltern, without even turning his eyes. "Hadn't the least idea of moving, I assure you. What's the game?"

By this time all the others were listening in a lazy, expectant way.

"Do you think," continued the major, with his voice trembling just a little, "do you think you can keep absolutely still for, say, two minutes—to save your life?"

"Are you joking?"

"On the contrary, move a muscle and you are a dead man. Can you stand the strain?"

The subaltern barely whispered, "Yes" and his face paled slightly.

"Burke," said the major, addressing an officer across the table, "pour some of that milk in a saucer, and set it here on the floor back of me. Gently, man! Quick!"

Not a word was spoken as the officer quickly filled the saucer, walked with it carefully around the table, and put it down where the major had indicated on the floor.

Like a marble statue sat the young subaltern in his white linen clothes, while a cobra di capella, which had been crawling up the leg of his trousers, slowly raised its head, then turned, descended to the floor, and glided toward the milk.

Suddenly the silence was broken by the report of the major's revolver, and the snake lay dead upon the floor.

"Thank you, major," said the subaltern, as the two men shook hands warmly. "You have saved my life."

"You're welcome, my boy," replied the senior, "but you did your share."—Youth's Companion.

IMPROVING TALENTS.

Two men start out to labor in the cause of God. One has had every advantage of education. His mind is cultivated, his powers are developed, and he is prepared to become an efficient worker. But we look in vain to see the good results of all the advantages he has enjoyed. Instead of increasing his usefulness, his education fosters a feeling of power and self-importance; he esteems himself above his less fortunate brethren. He does not continue to store his mind with useful knowledge, to fit himself for greater responsibilities. While he boasts of learning, he does not labor to the utmost of his ability, with an eye single to the glory of God. The other has good natural abilities, but a limited education. He is a constant learner in the school of Christ. The love of Jesus is in his heart, and he walks humbly with his God. He is unselfish in thought and purpose, and tries to do all the good he can. As he uses the ability he has, his mind expands. The Psalmist said, "The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple."

The educated man may exalt himself over his unlearned brother, but he is like the man in the parable who hid his talent in the earth. He has shunned the trouble and exertion necessary to trade with his intrusted talent, that he may be able to return it with increase, and he will be condemned as a slothful servant, and dismissed from the presence of his Lord. But the one who is faithful in the improvement of his talents will return both principal and interest, and will hear the "Well done, good and faithful servant." The man who blesses society and makes a success of life is the one, whether educated or uneducated, who uses all his powers in the service of God and his fellow-men.—Gospel Workers.

"SINGS-AS-HE-WALKS."

At the late meeting of the Lake Mohonk Indian Conference a brother told of a certain little Indian child who used to go toddling about on the grassy prairie of the Dakotas, and as he went he sang. In the morning and all day long his childish voice would be heard caroling forth the weird melodies which seem so dismal to us, but which mean so much to the children of the plains. His mother watched and heard him with delight, and with the poetic instinct which sleeps in every mother's heart, no matter how wild she may be, called the boy "Sings-as-he-walks." That boy is now a minister of the Gospel. He travels abroad on the Dakota prairies preaching and singing the Gospel to his own people. Did not the mother wisely name him? And would it not be a blessed thing if we could apply the name to more Christians? What a splendid description of a cheerful, hopeful, trustful ambassador of Christ: "Sings-as-he-walks."—Wm. J. Harsha, D.D.

DON'T

Don't snub a boy because his home is plain and unpretending. Abraham Lincoln's early home was a log cabin.

Don't snub a boy because he wears shabby clothes. When Edison, the great inventor, first entered Boston he wore a pair of yellow linen breeches in the depth of winter.

Don't snub a boy because of the ignorance of his parents. Shakespeare, the world's poet, was the son of a man who was unable to write his own name.

Don't snub a boy because he chooses a humble trade. The author of "Pilgrim's Progress" was a tinker.

Don't snub a boy because of physical disability. Milton was blind and Kitto was deaf.

Don't snub a boy who seems dull or stupid. Hogarth, the celebrated painter and engraver, was slow at learning and did not develop as soon as most boys.

Don't snub a boy because he stutters. Demosthenes, the greatest orator of Greece, overcame a harsh and stammering voice.

Don't snub any one. Not alone because they may far outstrip you in the race of life, but because it is neither kind nor right nor Christian. —Christian Advocate.

A BOY CONDUCTOR.

John C. Barnum is the youngest railroad conductor in the world. He is 13 years old. He was born in New York, but has resided in Oregon for the past nine years. His home is in Medford, Jackson county, on the Southern Pacific. On January 20, 1893, his father leased the Rogue River Valley Railroad, which runs from Medford to Jacksonville, a distance of five miles, and as its revenues are light, he took charge of the engine and placed his son on the train as conductor. He wears the conventional cap and uniform, with lettered brass buttons, and carries a punch.

Conductor Barnum likes his work, and says that he gets along nicely except with some of the very smart drummers, who are often on his train, and who guy him about his inability to handle their heavy baggage. He had an amusing experience with a big fellow not long ago, but came out ahead and earned the hearty applause of a trainload of people. The big fellow thought it would be smart to play a trick on the little conductor before the crowd, and when called on for his "fare," said he had lost his ticket and was out of money. Johnnie knew better, but told the smart party that he must pay his fare or get off. This was sneered at, and the conductor passed on, while his would be deadhead snickered over the joke. Soon afterward the conductor slipped up behind the fellow, seized his hat and put it in the express chest in the baggage compartment, calmly locking the chest. The big drummer followed him and demanded the hat, but was quietly informed that it would be held until he paid his fare. Before the train reached its destination the fare was paid and the hat surrendered to its owner, who sneaked away amid the jeers of the crowd.

He fills his position with a dignity and precision beyond his diminutive proportions, and as the danger on this road from collision is confined to an occasional brush with the hindquarters of a cow, our little conductor's responsibilities are not more exacting than his abilities.—Selected.

BAD BOOKS.

Never, under any circumstances, read a bad book; and never spend a serious hour in reading a second-rate book. No words can overstate the mischief of bad reading.

A bad book will often haunt a man his whole life long. It is often remembered when much that is better is forgotten; it intrudes itself at the most solemn moments, and contaminates the best feelings and emotions. Reading trashy, second-rate books is a grievous waste of time, also.

In the first place, there are a great many more first-rate books than ever you can master; and, in the second place, you cannot read an inferior book without giving up an opportunity of reading a good one.

Books, remember, are friends; books affect character; and you can as little neglect your duty in respect of this as you can safely neglect any other moral duty that is cast upon you.—Coleridge.

WHAT IS THY LIFE?

What is thy life that thou shouldst toil and plan,
And struggle with the "moth and rust"
For a poor handful of earth's dust,
Oh, heart of man!
A spark that glimmereth
An instant in the dark—
A breath that quivereth
Ere it is lost in death—
A power
That reigneth for an hour;
Is this thy life?
Wilt thou find comfort in the name of Destiny?
Or say that Fate's unceasing wheel
Hath whirled thee into being, and will still bear thee along?
One, and One only, standeth on the verge
Of the eternal silence—One
Who doth ever whisper to thy doubting soul,
"Trust and be strong!"

TEMPERANCE.

MEMORIAL MEETINGS OF THE ORIGINAL OHIO TEMPERANCE "CRUSADERS."

In the old Crusade church, at Hillsboro, a memorable meeting was held December 23. The morning was warm, and so calm that Mother Thompson was allowed to venture out for the first time since her attack of the grippe. The program of Miss Greenwood was carried out, but the personal experiences of overflowing hearts made the occasion truly a "crusade anniversary."

Seventeen of the "original band" were present, and toward the many who had moved to other earthly localities, and the blessed number who have "obtained the prize," Mother Thompson feelingly writes. "It was natural that our hearts should 'On the eagle wings of love,' aspire to sweet fellowship." She adds, "New impulses were given for future work and the prospect is that some important additions will be made to our working force. The impoverished condition of our union and of our citizens, generally, because of the time, and the explosion of our Citizens' National Bank, gave us cause for humiliation, because our offerings must needs be so sadly minus, but God will make up our lack of service.

"We were greatly rejoiced by the presence of one dear old gentleman, who said he was induced to join us in our services that he might offer upon the altar earnest thanksgiving, for the crusade had startled him from a life of indulgence that if continued would have ruined him soul and body. Now at the age of eighty-one he was clear-headed, sound in body, and full of gratitude to God, and the noble, brave crusaders. He said also many other good things, which I have not time to write, but which are treasured in my heart, for that speaker was no other than Judge Thompson."

Athens celebrated the anniversary on the 24th. Rev. Wm. A. Powell gave an excellent address, and several short talks were given by old crusaders. It was an inspiring meeting.

On the 28th the Nelsonville union held an all-day meeting in commemoration. Mrs. Helen S. Burns, now their district president, who twenty years ago had the honor of offering the first prayer, when the crusaders of that place began their visits to the saloons, was with them for the occasion and assisted in the meeting. Eight new members were secured. One can imagine Mrs. Burns' enjoyment of that day and of the large prosperity that has attended that union. Twelve crusaders were present.

The anniversary was duly celebrated in Cleveland. The Wade Park Avenue union held a meeting at 2 P. M., Sabbath, the 24th, and the West Side union held a large meeting in the evening, in the M. E. church. Mrs. S. M. Perkins gave addresses at each meeting, and also assisted Mrs. T. K. Doty in the jail services in the morning. Mrs. Mary Ingham, Mrs. J. T. Foote, Mrs. Geo. Presley, original crusaders, also gave addresses at the West Side meeting. Rev. Dr. Buxton, pastor of the church, is in accord with the work, and his wife is a valiant leader. Greetings from Mother Thompson were read.

Franklin union held an interesting meeting on the 23d, in the M. E. church. Twenty-one members were present, thirteen of whom were original crusaders. The meeting was opened by reading the crusade Psalm, followed by prayer. An address was given by Rev. Mr. Haynes. Readings from Mother Stewart's Memories were an interesting feature, and were followed by personal reminiscences from old crusaders.—Antoinette H. Clevenger, State Reporter, Wilmington.

THE PETITION

Of the World's Woman's Christian Temperance Union for the protection of the home; addresed

TO THE GOVERNMENTS OF THE WORLD.

Honored Rulers, Representatives and Brothers:

We, your petitioners, although belonging to the physically weaker sex, are strong of heart to love our homes, our native land, and the world's family of nations.

We know that clear brains and pure hearts make honest lives and happy homes, and that by these the nations prosper, and the time is brought nearer when the world shall be at peace.

We know that indulgence in alcohol and opium, and in other vices which disgrace our social life, makes misery for all the world, and most of all for us and for our children.

We know that stimulants and opiates are sold under legal guarantees, which make the governments partners in the traffic, by accepting as revenue a portion of the profits, and we know with shame that they are often forced by treaty upon populations, either ignorant or unwilling.

We know that the law might do much, now left undone, to raise the moral tone of society, and render vice difficult.

We have no power to prevent these great iniquities beneath which the whole world groans, but you have power to redeem the honor of the nations from an indefensible complicity.

We therefore come to you with the united voices of representative women of every land, beseeching you to raise the standard of the law to that of Christian morals, to strip away the safeguards and sanctions of the state from the drink traffic and the opium trade, and to protect our homes by the total prohibition of these curses of civilization throughout all the territory over which your government extends.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The calling of Abram.—vs. 1–3. The call is imperative, admitting of no delay. "Get thee out." Leave country and kindred behind thee. A Christian's first duty is to separate himself from the world. There may be instances recorded in the Bible, as in the case of Naaman of good men who did not see, or at least did not conform to, this duty of separation. But it is noticeable that they are never heard of afterwards. Such persons may be finally saved "so as by fire," but their spiritual life is too low to make any decided impress on those around them, and they pass away without achieving any great work for God. If Abram had continued to dwell among his idolatrous countrymen, he would never have been Abraham, "the father of the faithful." At most, his history would have been like Lot's in Sodom. Ur of the Chaldees was then one of the famous centers of ancient civilization. Dr. Geikie says of it: "Four thousand years ago the arts and sciences were cultivated; astronomers watched the heavens; poets composed hymns and epics, and patient scribes stamped on soft clay tablets the books which have in part come down to our day." It was not a little that Abram was called to give up, and this, too, at an age when the ties of old associations are strongest and hardest to sever. We have no right to say, however advanced in years, that our day of usefulness is over. It may be with us, as with Abraham, that our greatest achievements lie before us, for which our days of youth and maturity were but the time of preparation. "Unto a land that I will shew thee." He trusted God's bare word. He walked by faith, not by sight, and "went out, not knowing whither he went." So we who "seek a heavenly country," must seek it in faith, as a land which God will shew to us. God's commands are always coupled with "exceeding great and precious promises." "I will make of thee a great nation." This promise could never have been realized had he stayed in his own country. The reason why God's promises often seem incompletely fulfilled is because of a failure to perfectly fulfill the conditions, and to sever every tie which binds us to the world. "I will bless thee.... and thou shalt be a blessing." This is the Christian's life—blessing and blest. "I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee." "Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm." God's blessing is sure to follow those who do good to his saints, as surely as the reverse will follow those who ill-treat or persecute them. "In thee"—through the Messiah, who should descend from him—"shall all families of the earth be blessed." Here was another severe test of faith to the childless Abraham. But, in the words of Matthew Henry, "those who deal with God must deal upon trust."

2. Abram's departure.—vs. 4, 5. According to the account given by Stephen, in the seventh chapter of Acts, the call came to Abram in Mesopotamia, "before he dwelt in Haran," where he stayed—we do not know how long—until the death of his father, Terah. Duties never conflict. It was, without doubt, Abram's first duty to care for his aged father. This is implied by the wholehearted completeness of his obedience when that duty no longer stood in his way. He left nothing behind him that would be a snare to his affections or incite the least wish to return. He did not seek Canaan alone, but Lot, his brother's son; and "all the souls they had gotten in Haran" went with him. So the Christian should not be satisfied to seek the heavenly Canaan alone, but will seek to win others to go with him.

3. The entrance into Canaan.—vs. 6–9. "And the Canaanite was then in the land." Abram had obeyed God. He had turned his back on his own people and sought a strange country, in which at the time of his death he owned only a burial-place. What better type can we have of the Christian who has turned his back on the world in search of the heavenly Canaan. With every advance he makes heavenward, more and more of heaven is brought into his life. And yet he is not given possession till he passes over the river of death. The Canaanite is still in the land;—foes against which he has to struggle; secret, treacherous enemies, who are always on the watch to do him harm. "And the Lord appeared unto Abram"—at just the time when he especially needed encouragement,—when he had given up all for God, but as yet had not received even the earnest of the promised reward. From the plain of Moreh he removed to a mountain on the east of Bethel. Says Henry: "First a plain, then a mountain. God hath set the one over against the other." "And there he builded an altar to the Lord." Unlike many brought up in church-going communities, and by godly parents, who emigrate to new countries, Abram took his religion with him. There is all the more reason for keeping up our observance of religious duties when we are in a strange land, where everything tends to make us forget them. "And Abram journeyed, going on still towards the south." So the Christian should take no step backward, but keep a steady advance in his journey heavenward.

THE BOY'S COMPANION; or, A Warning Against the Secret Vice and Other Bad Habits. By E. E. Byrum, Author of "Divine Healing of Soul and Body." Illustrated. Paper, 25 cents. Grand Junction, Mich.: Gospel Trumpet Co.

All such books are liable to be retro-active—to excite a wrong emotion in the mind of a lad untainted by the vice to which it relates. Hence, although it might be useful in the cases of some misled boys, parents should not place it in the hands of their children without careful discrimination. Had it been addressed to heads of families, instead of the lads, we believe its object would have been more safely accomplished.

AUTOBIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES AND PERSONAL RECOLLECTIONS. By Geo. T. Angell, President of the American Humane Education Society, the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and the Parent American Band of Mercy, 19 Milk street, Boston, Mass. Published for the Use of His Friends and All Who Care to Read Them. 8vo. pp. 155. Price, in paper, 6 cents; by mail, 10 cents; in cloth, 20 cents; by mail, 25 cents. Published by the American Humane Education Society, 19 Milk street, Boston.

THE STRIKE AT SHANE'S: A Sequel to "Black Beauty." (No. 2 of Gold Mine Series.) A Prize Story of Indiana. Written for, and Revised, Copyrighted and Published by the American Humane Education Society, 19 Milk street, Boston. pp. 91; price, in paper, sent by mail, 10 cents.

No man has a more profound interest in all that pertains to the protection of children and animals, against all forms of cruelty, than Geo. T. Angell. Indefatigable in his efforts to secure comfort to all creatures, working, writing, lecturing, and publishing in this behalf continually, he has become one of the greatest and best educators in the school of humanity, and his influence is widely felt. His position at the head of the American Humane Education Society places him in an intelligent relation to the barbarities of the times as practiced upon unprotected children and dumb animals, and whatever he writes, says, or does will leave a healthful and lasting impression upon the age.

The object of this society is to carry humane education into all American schools and homes, and to found humane societies and "bands of mercy" all over this continent. In pursuance of this plan, it is issuing books, pamphlets and periodicals relating to its work by millions, and distributing them everywhere. The two pamphlets above named are specimens of the literature sent out by this society. Mr. Angell's "Autobiographical Sketches" have more than a fleeting interest. They form an excellent epitome of this good man's character and labors, and present many incentives for his readers to assist in the promotion of his beautiful work. The price places this pamphlet within the reach of all, and we are sure that all Christian readers will give it a hearty endorsement.

Among other work accomplished by the society of which Mr. Angell is the head, it has printed and distributed, and caused to be circulated, about a million and a half copies of "Black Beauty"—a fascinating story of a horse told by itself—being probably the largest number ever circulated of any book within the same period after its first issue. "The Strike at Shane's" is much in the same vein, and is intended to point out, in a familiar manner, some of the mistaken ideas fostered by people in general regarding the relations existing between the human race and the lower animals and birds. The story is founded upon a "strike" among the feathered bipeds against the cruelty of bipeds who wear clothes, and is told in a pleasing way. It is a good book for the family circle—including all ages.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The Preacher's Magazine for January is the first number of the fourth volume of this most excellent homiletical periodical. The leading sermon is entitled Christian Brotherhood, and is by the venerable William M. Sinclair, Archdeacon of London. The senior editor, Mark Guy Pearse, contributes another chapter on Moses: His Life and Its Lessons, taking up The Story of the Golden Calf. Joseph Parker, D.D., writes on How to Read the Scriptures, and Dr. C. O. Eldridge, The Key of Experience, or Pages for Young Preachers. Outlines and sketches of sermons on various subjects are furnished by many distinguished clergymen, and among them a children's sermon with the subject Room, by the Rev. J. Reid Howatt. There are also excellent articles, by James Stalker, D.D., on A Young Man's Religion, and Money, by the Rev. Andrew Murray. Among the other departments are Notes and Illustrations, the International Sunday-school Lessons, Outline Addresses on the Golden Texts, and About Books. The magazine is published monthly, at $1.50 per year. Send 15 cents for a sample copy to Wilbur B. Ketcham, 2 Cooper Union, New York City.

The January number of the Cottage Hearth presents a selection of illustrated stories and articles that cannot fail to please many readers. A strong impression will be made by The Story of a Life, by James Knapp Reeve. Of equal interest is an article on The Houses of Parliament, by Anna Wiley Burns. A Tale from the Talmud, one of Mr. Henry Austin's productions, is remarkable for the unique verse in which it is told. Other articles of interest are How Electricity Moves Street Cars, by Geo. J. Varney; A Graveyard Idyl, by E. C. Shipman; The Barber's Ghost, by Peter H. Walsh; and The Story of a Picture, by E. H. Murphy. The departments maintain their usual standard of excellence. $1.50 a year. W. A. Wilde & Co., Boston.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

CONGREGATIONALIST.

—The Congregational Church Building Society reports that in the unusual year on which it has just made its annual report, the largest sum ever received by at least $14,000 has been covered into its treasury. That sum foots up $182,462. These receipts include the gifts of churches, individuals, loans refunded, annuity trusts, interest, insurance on houses burned, etc.

—Joseph Cook's new series of Boston Monday Lectures began Jan. 22, and will be delivered in Park Street church. This is the nineteenth year of this unique Boston lectureship. The subject is to be "Cosmopolitan Christianity, or the Invincible Gospel in the World's Parliament of Religions." In nothing has Mr. Cook shown more signally the sagacity of his discernment as to what are the most vital questions of the time, than in the special themes discussed by him in these famous lectures.

FOREIGN.

—Among the various means of extending evangelistic work in Ireland is the Bible and Colportage society, in which the various evangelical churches unite for the purpose of spreading the truth throughout Ireland. The thirty-fourth annual report of this society shows that during 1893 the total sales have been 6,424 Bibles, 4,284 Testaments and 282,457 religious books.

—The Protestant churches of France have lately published new statistics showing that they have houses of worship in 781 localities in the French Republic. They have 887 reformed pastors, all of whom are employed, and 12 reformed chaplains in the army. There are only 90 clergymen of the Lutheran church, 47 of the Evangelical church, and other Protestant denominations have 72. Under Protestant auspices there are 5 Bible societies, 19 societies for home missions, 44 orphans' homes, 47 refugee houses, 60 hospitals and 118 periodicals. The Protestants of France support the work of the church with a good degree of liberality.

PRESBYTERIAN.

—The Secretaries of the Presbyterian Home Missionary Board make to the churches a brief but very startling statement as to "the exact state of the home treasury." "To say that it is unsatisfactory is too mild—it is alarming." "To protect our devoted missionaries against suffering as far as possible during the hard times we have borrowed $325,000, not a penny of which has yet been paid." They must, it is declared, keep faith with the bank and keep faith all around; "and there is but one way of doing this."

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Out of 50,000 Sioux, over 4,000 are now members of Episcopal, Presbyterian, or Congregational churches. Many, if not most of these, have become citizens. The contribution of those connected with the Episcopalians amounted to $4,100 last year, while the women raised $2,210.

Freemasonry Exposed. By Capt. William Morgan. The genuine old Morgan book republished. 25 cents each.

Allyn's Ritual of Freemasonry by Avery Allyn contains the fully Illustrated Ritual of the Blue Lodge, Chapter Council and Commandery, 11 of the Scotch Rite Degrees, Several Masonic side degrees and what is termed a Key to the Phi Beta Kappa, the Orange and Odd-fellows Societies. Price in cloth $5.00.

Duncan's Masonic Ritual and Monitor. Profusely illustrated with explanatory engravings, and containing the ritual and work of the order for the seven degrees, including the Royal Arch. Though extensively used as an Instruction Book and one of the best in the market it is not as accurate as "Freemasonry Illustrated," the first book on catalogue. Price in cloth, $2 50.

Richardson's Monitor of Freemasonry. Containing the ceremonies of Lodges, Chapters, Encampments, etc. Illustrated. Although extensively used in conferring the higher degrees, it is not only very incomplete but inaccurate especially as regards the first seven degrees, and as to the higher degrees it gives but a description and general idea of the degrees rather than the full ritual. Price in cloth, $1.25; Paper covers, 75c.

Look to the East. A Ritual of the first three Masonic Degrees by Ralph Lester. Price in cloth $2.00. Notwithstanding the high price this book is very inferior in every way to Freemasonry Illustrated or The Handbook of Freemasonry at a quarter the price.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void: OR FREEMASONRY SELF-CONVICTED. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. 207 pages. Postpaid, 40 cents each.

Judge Whitney's Defense before THE GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H. Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. H. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each.

General Washington Opposed to SECRET SOCIETIES. This is a re-publication of Governor Joseph Ritner's "Vindication of General Washington from the Stigma of Adherence to Secret Societies," communicated to the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, March 8, 1837, at their special request. To this is added the fact that three high Masons were the only persons who opposed a vote of thanks to Washington on his retirement to private life—undoubtedly because they considered him a seceding Freemason. 10cts each.

Morgan's Exposition, Abduction AND MURDER, AND OATHS OF 33 DEGREES. Composed of "Freemasonry Exposed," by Capt. Wm. Morgan;" "History of the Abduction and Murder of Morgan;" "Valance's Confession of the Murder of Capt. Wm. SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.
BY MARIA WATERBURY.
Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wan'ed one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeare l, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun 'orgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out far dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' aid 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer' "

Inter Ocean: 'A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Missi-sippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

HOME AND HEALTH.

HOW TO DRY WET SHOES.

When, without overshoes, you have been caught in a heavy rain-storm, perhaps you have known already what to do with your best kid boots, which have been thoroughly wet through, and which, if left to dry in the ordinary way, will be stiff, brittle, and unlovely? If not, you will be glad to learn what I heard only recently, from one whose experience is of value. First wipe off gently with a soft cloth all surface water and mud; then, while still wet, rub well with kerosene oil, using for the purpose the furred side of canton flannel. Set them aside till partially dry, when a second treatment with oil is advisable. They may then be deposited in a conveniently warm place, where they will dry gradually and thoroughly. Before applying French kid-dressing, give them a final rubbing with the flannel, still slightly dampened with kerosene, and your boots will be as soft and flexible as new kid, and be very little affected by their bath in the rain.—Harper's Bazar.

A NEW OYSTER STEW.

A writer in Christian at Work says: One day a mistake was made in ordering oysters. There was no time to get more. One cupful of oysters must make stew for five persons. A slice of nice salt pork about two inches square and of the usual thickness was cut into tiny bits and fried out; a teaspoon of flour was stirred in and allowed to simmer; next the oysters with their juice were added and allowed to "plump;" the required amount of hot milk with its seasoning of butter was poured in and the soup was served piping hot. Nothing was said of the daring new process until the four who were not in the secret had remarked that the stew was especially good; thus lending themselves to future economy in oyster soup.

Harper's Weekly facetiously argues that, as within a stated period more people have been killed in washing windows than in the game of football, it would be wiser to abolish the former rather than the latter. But more persons wash windows than play foot-ball.

Buckingham's Dye for the Whiskers is a popular preparation in one bottle, and colors evenly a brown or black. Any person can easily apply it at home.

United Presbyterians among our readers will be glad to learn that the Midland of Omaha is about to remove to Chicago. This will answer the most common and seemingly only objection to it—"too far west." The Midland is newsy, spicy and sound, liberal and loyal and patriotic and progressive; it excels in giving the news of its own denomination, in supporting the reforms of the day and in advocating home missions. Send for a free sample copy. Address the Midland Publishing Co. Its regular price is $1.50, but to one of our old subscribers who becomes a new subscriber to the Midland, both papers will be sent by us for $2.50. To one who becomes a new subscriber to both, the Cynosure and Midland, the papers will cost for one year only $2 00. Address, Christian Cynosure, 221 W. Madison street.

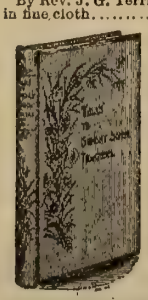
By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75



This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Telescope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches with an earnestness born of conviction.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,
BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Triunity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by perusing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polemical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FARM NOTES.

The owner who takes pride and feels rich in the possession of trees will make them pay best. With choice apples at even $1 to $1.50 per barrel, in what can money be more easily made after an orchard is grown? No plant thrives better than the apple under a surface kept cool and moist by mulch of dead material like brush, stalks, stones, etc., or heavy matted sod. When trees are of good size, it will pay to devote the field entirely to their use. The most productive and profitable orchard I know, says somebody, "is kept bare and hard always under a heavy mulch of salt hay."

A number of plants have seeds which occasionally seem to have the property of leaping. It is now ascertained that this is in consequence of the motion of insects which make their home in these seeds. One kind, known as the "Mexican Jumping Bean," owes the motion, according to Prof. Riley, to an insect which he calls Carpocapsa saltitans.— Meehans' Monthly.

Chopped vegetables, such as cabbages, turnips and onions, may be fed to poultry during the winter with profit, especially if a large supply of eggs is desired. Chopped onions are excellent for all kinds of fowls. Small cabbages, unmerchantable potatoes and inferior turnips and other roots can be purchased quite cheaply and are good for poultry.

There are thousands of old apple trees in New England that are a nuisance. They yield no fruit and serve as breeding places for insects and worms. Apple wood makes the best of fuel, and these old trees should all be converted into firewood before a stick of forest growth is cut.—N. E. Farmer.

Butter must be pleasing to the eye, as well as acceptable to the taste, to bring customers. Scrupulous neatness in butter making requires no capital, and yet returns a splendid income on the investment.

When you're Rubbing over your washboard, in that painful, old-fashioned way, these are some of your positions. Just try these motions, up and down, without the tub. That will prove how hard they are. Then try Pearline's way of washing.

That will prove how needless and absurd they are. Without the washboard and the rubbing on it, and without bending over the wash-tub or bobbing up and down over it —you save the wear to your clothes and the work for your back. That's Pearline's way. Directions on every package.

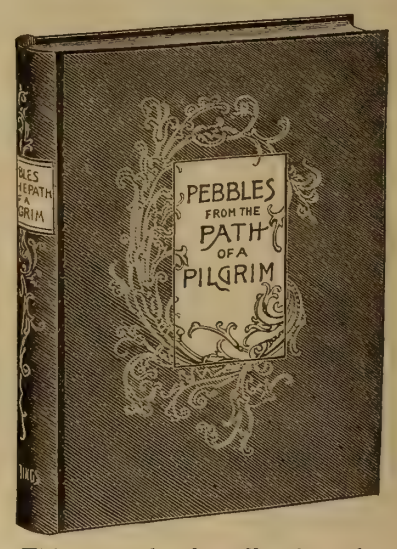
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL ANTI-SECRECY MEETING.

To the Friends of the Cause of Anti-secrecy in Pennsylvania:—You are requested to assemble in the First United Presbyterian church, corner of Broad and Lombard streets, in the city of Philadelphia, on Monday and Tuesday, February 26 and 27, to hear reports and discuss matters that pertain to the Master's cause as they stand related to the National Christian Association and its work.

The opening session will be on Monday, February 26, at 7:30 P. M.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard, Field Secretary, will arrange and report program, with the advice of friends in Philadelphia.

Perils are imminent—the times auspicious. Let prayer be made for the presence and blessing of the Master of assemblies. Let there be a full rally of godly, praying people, male and female. Wise men will be glad to confer and know what "Israel ought to do" to turn back the tide of this flood which the dragon has sent out to destroy the church and the nation.

Reformers should be aroused!

Statesmen should be warned!

Victims should be saved from this all-desolating flood!

Let this convention inaugurate a new era of activity, zeal and success.

S. COLLINS, Pres.
J. S. T. MILLIGAN, Cor. Sec'y.
Beaver, Pa., Jan. 12, 1894.

2:00—Report of Committee on Resolutions and discussion of the same.

2:45—Music.

3:00—Open parliament, followed by short addresses. Persons desiring to speak for or against secret societies will be given five minutes. We expect to hear from Rev. T. S. Bennett, of the United Brethren church, Eldred, Pa.; Rev. Nathan Callender, pastor Baptist church, Montdale, Pa.; Rev. Joel Swartz, pastor Lutheran church, Gettysburg, Pa.; J. C. Yoder, Huntingdon, Pa.; together with the following pastors in this city: Rev. F. W. Weiskotten, St. James Lutheran; Rev. T. T. Myers, Church of the Brethren; Rev. N. B. Grubb, Mennonite; Rev. F. Edquist, Swedish Congregational; Rev. C. Elofson, Swedish Lutheran. (Other names may be added.)

4:30—Chalk Talk, Pfof. R. L. Park, of Soudersburgh (Pa.) Normal School.

Evening Session. 7:30—Prayer, followed by music.

8:00—An address, some W. C. T. U. speaker.

8:30—Music.

8:45—An address, Rev. David McAllister, pastor Covenanter church, Pittsburgh, Pa. Subject, False Religion the Basis of all Evil.

The above program is subject to changes.

The following incident, related by Rev. Mr. Adams, the financial agent of the United Brethren College at Toledo, Iowa, shows how little influence Freemasonry had with the ministry in Cedar Rapids, Iowa, when the corner-stone of the Masonic Library was laid in that city. About thirteen pastors were invited to seats on the platform, and informed that a carriage would be sent for them. One accepted—a Presbyterian pastor—who said that he rode in the carriage, went to the place as a recreation, etc., and not because of any interest that he had in Masonry. Another pastor, whom it was well known had once joined the fraternity, gave as his reason for not accepting the invitation, that "when he was converted God took Masonry from him with his other sins." Such instances only prove how antagonistic is pure Christianity to Freemasonry.

Following are important rulings relating to pensions, recently issued by the Interior Department at Washington: The act of Congress prohibiting payment of pensions after July, 1893, to a non-resident of the United States, except for actual service disabilities, applies to widows who are non-resident aliens; that where a soldier dies, leaving a legally divorced wife and minor children over 16 years old, his mother occupied a pensionable status and can apply for and receive a pension as dependent mother of such soldier upon making necessary proof; and that where an invalid pensioner dies, leaving no increase or rerating claim pending at the bureau, but has accepted the rate of pension then received without demurring, the widow cannot file an original claim for re-rating of her dead husband's pension.

The National League for the Protection of American Institutions (a non-secret organization), with headquarters at 1 Madison avenue, New York City, is now circulating a petition to Congress, praying that no more appropriations be made for the support of schools among Indians controlled by any religious denomination. Among other statements contained in this petition, the League notes the fact that, "The highest official bodies of the Congregational, the Methodist Episcopal, the Presbyterian and Protestant Episcopal churches have determined to withdraw their applications for funds from the United States Treasury, because of the principle which they now see is involved in the dangerous practice, and they propose henceforth to support their own schools without government aid." These churches will co-operate with the League in discountenancing all sectarian appropriations for the education of the Indians. With their membership and adherents they represent a population of 14,750,000. With them the League petitions that the amount of public funds thus freely relinquished may be added to the fund for establishing common schools among the Indians. The League petitions that the government now adopt a definite, permanent and uniform principle, in accord with the Federal Constitution, for advancing the education of Indians, on the basis of the American free public school system. Copies of this petition can be obtained at the office of the League. Ask for Document No. Twenty.

SECRECY AND CHRISTIANITY.

[Address of Rev. M. D. Kneeland before the convention of the New England Christian Association at Boston, December 20, 21, 1893.]

3. Passing from the effects of the secret lodge upon the indvidual, we notice further that it is opposed to the Christian home. It intrudes its skeleton form into all its hallowed associations. It forces those who are identified with it to live a double life—one often very different from the other. It stands between husband and wife, father and child, as with a drawn sword, and says, "Hitherto and no farther." Night after night, it woos from what should be the most delightful place on earth, the abode of wife, children and loved ones—those who have been absent from home during the whole day and so makes it a mere lodging-place—a travesty on the Christian home.

Where it is followed faithfully and its vows are kept, the home-life is sadly interfered with, and in its place a substitute is put which cannot possibly meet the demand which God has centered in the Christian home. I could tell you to-night of many, many sad homes which have been made so through the secret lodge or club—wives whose husbands have been torn from them by its evil influences; of children who have been rendered worse than fatherless by its polluting, desecrating touch.

4. Again, the secret lodge is opposed to the church of Jesus Christ. They both depend for their membership upon the communities in which they are situated, and are practically rivals of each other. It is true that in some instances their members are the same people. The general rule is, however, that in just that proportion in which they are loyal to one, they are indifferent to the other. An ardent lodge man has little time or inclination to attend to the duties and responsibilities of the church. He says, "If I live up to the teachings of the lodge, that is good enough religion for me." On the other hand, a live, devoted church member does not care to spend his evenings at the lodge. Not unfre-quently, as his interest in Christ and his kingdom increases, he sees the pettiness, the narrowness, if not the hypocrisy and utter worldliness of the lodge, and withdraws his support from the latter. Among acquaintances, I have the honor to know quite a number of these deserters from the lodge, and I have found them uniformly men of earnest views, who look back upon the time which they wasted upon the lodge with deep regret, and they are striving to make amends for past unfaithfulness by a more efficient service for Christ.

If this is all, we have made out a case against secrecy which should deter the Christian from entering its ranks, and should cause those who are already enrolled to consider well their duty in the premises.

But this is not all. Would to God it were. Charges have been made again and again, and never successfully confuted, that in some of the secret organizations the influence of the oaths, forms and methods is not only Christless, but also blasphemous and soul-destroying. They are a mixture of the heathen and semi-Christian, in such proportions as to make the whole system inconsistent with the aims, methods and spirit of the Christian church.

5. Again, the secret lodge is opposed to the Christian social life. In order to substantiate this charge, we must know whereof we speak, since the most enticing argument for secrecy is its good-fellowship. While we do not deny that the lodge-room may be the favorite resort of socially inclined people, generally the idle and gossippy; and while the system may have benevolent features, as caring for and burying its destitute members, these features are in no sense the result of secrecy and should not be credited to the system.

Some social features, however, do exist under the cover, and as the direct result of secrecy, which are most detrimental to the best interests of society. It is not a subject of mere hearsay, but proved, established and admitted that un-Christian practices often prevail at the social gatherings of secret organizations. Drunkenness is not an uncommon occurrence at their orgies. Many times, intemperate habits have been formed and confirmed in connection with such good-fellowship. Not unfrequently the smoking, dancing, drinking scenes continue till the early hours of the morning, when the over-convivial brethren are borne or accompanied to their homes to sleep off their debauch at leisure. That such an occurrence is possible at rare intervals even, and I am forced to believe that it is not uncommon, proves the whole boasted social life of such societies rotten to the core. Such social evils far exceed all advantages. But do not these orders provide opportunities of making friends of great value to the stranger and traveler and the man-without-work? I answer, that depends entirely upon the man. A friendly man will always make friends, whether he can give the grip or not. A worthy man will eventually find his level without boosting. A man who really wants to work will generally get it in ordinary times. I want it to be understood that I heartily commend whatever helps the poor to work. Let the church imitate the greatest and best of teachers, rather than the lodge.

It is well to inform those who are ignorant of the fact that not unfrequently the friends who are made through secret orders may be the very worst friends one can have. I have heard of their being sharks, vultures and scorpions, a social bane.

Take three instances. In the case of Wm. Morgan they were murderers; in the case of Sinclair, they were tipplers and rakes; in the case of Frank, they were knaves.

As far as I am able to learn, no moral test prevails in most secret orders, though certain moral lessons may be found in some rituals. As a result, all types of character exist among their members. These are brought together in close contact, like good and bad apples in the same barrel. The result is, that the bad contaminate the good, and a low standard of social morals must and does necessarily result.

6. Once more: The secret lodge is opposed to Christian stewardship. As stewards of God, all that we have belongs to him. The Christian man should use "freely" his money for the relief of the poor and the upbuilding of righteousness in this world. While we commend the benevolent features of the lodge, we are confident that they are over-exaggerated. It has been estimated that it takes $3 to distribute $5 of lodge-money. The large fees, taxes and special assessments are generally expended in the support of the order and in mere selfish indulgence. The tinsel display of regalia and procession, the elaborate gifts and emblems of gold and precious stones, the expensive architecture and furnishings of lodges and temples, the days and weeks of public conclave and convention, require large expenditures of money, compared with which the much-advertised benevolence is a mere pittance. I am convinced that if all the money which is lavished upon secrecy were turned into church and temperance missionary channels, there would be a grand surplus rather than a sad dearth. It is pitiable to see so much worse than wasted, when there are multitudes of cold and hungry all about us. It is a notorious fact that the highest degrees of secrecy cost small fortunes, and the poor rarely obtain them. Certainly such outlays are a doubtful use of God's money.

The charge which we make against the whole system is that it radically mistakes the divine idea of Christian stewardship. Its gifts are in the interest of its own membership. It exists for the favored few; leagues itself against the many. The mission of Christianity is to go and disciple all nations. The mission of secrecy is to help its own. Christianity is world-wide love. Secretism is condensed selfishness. Christianity woos men in order to save them. The lodge admits members in order to maintain itself and hand down its pretentious secrets from age to age.

To summarize: Christianity makes true freemen and freewomen. Secretism destroys individual liberty. Christianity develops man upward into the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ Jesus. Secretism stunts and throttles Christian growth. Christianity founds and maintains that most holy organism, the home. Secretism weakens and destroys it. Christianity chooses the church of Christ, of which he is the head, for its dwelling-place. Secretism shuns it or dares to rival it and usurp some of its functions. Christianity sweetens and hallows social life; secretism pollutes and undermines it. Christianity gives itself in order to help and save the world; secretism lives for itself at the expense of the world. Christianity is the kingdom of God among men, which shall become more and more bright and glorious; secrecy is the throne of the prince of this world, enveloped in darkness, and vomiting forth evil.

MIDWINTER MUSINGS.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

There is a fitness in comparing life to a journey. Moses said to Hobab the Midianite, his father-in-law: "We are journeying to a land of which the Lord hath said, I will give it thee." The believer is journeying from the city of destruction to the New Jerusalem. All the males in Israel were required to go up to Jerusalem three times in the year. "So they from strength unwearied go, still forward unto strength, until in Zion they appear before the Lord at length." The believer is advancing in Christian attainments as he goes through life. "The path of the just is as a shiniug light, that shines more and more unto the perfect day." A traveler, reaching a mountain-top, looks back over the path already passed over, and forward upon the way yet to be traversed. The end of the year 1893 and the beginning of 1894 is such a height. Bellamy has written a very clever novel, "Looking Backward." He represents himself as standing at the end of the twentieth century and reviewing the achievement of the past years. The Apostle John, from the Isle of Patmos, was permitted to look forward, and see the future history of the church and world. From the summit of this present let us look backward and forward.

1. What have we done for God? If the question were, What has God done for us? we would reply, What has he not done for us? He has loaded us with his benefits. All his paths dropped down fatness upon us. His mercy endureth forever. It is true he has laid his hand upon us in "the hard times." But men in this "mercy rejoiceth against judgment." The "hard times" have come in a year of abundant harvests. They are far less than we deserve. And to every believer afflictions are sanctified and made to work for his good. "He doeth all things well."

But what have we done for him? He gives us fifty-two Sabbaths in the year. In a life of threescore-and-ten years there are ten years of Sabbaths. How have we spent them? Are we not robbing God of his time by the United States mail and the railroad service? What is it but taking God's hours to sit down and read the Sunday newspaper on Sabbath morning? We are stewards of God. All we have is his. The question is not, How much can we spare for God? but, How much can he spare for us? How many of us have robbed God in tithes and offerings? What contributions have we made for the enlargement of Christ's kingdom in the earth? What service have we rendered in the warfare against the forces of the kingdom of darkness? After we have done all, we are unprofitable servants. What are we if we have done little or nothing?

2. What have we done for ourselves? Some have succeeded in earning a living. Others have accumulated enough to make them comfortable for life. A few have piled up immense fortunes. But this "bodily exercise" profiteth nothing, when unattended by the spiritual. "Wherefore do you spend your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not?" How many have found Christ, the pearl of great price, for whom they will sell all that they have? Without Christ, our lives are like the whirlpool, circling round self, and drawing everthing within reach into the central vortex. In Christ our lives are like a river, swelling up to the brim, and blessing the land through which it flows. "He that believeth on me," as the Scriptures hath said, "out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." How many believers have become less worldly and more godly? The life of a believer here is a divided one. The Missouri river is a muddy river. When it empties into the Mississippi, the great river is half clear and half muddy. And thus it flows on for miles, until the pure waters clean the filthy and it becomes again a pure river. There are two principles active in the believer's life, the good and the evil. "The flesh lusteth against the Spirit." But the Spirit increases in power, while the flesh diminishes. The house of Saul waxes weaker and weaker, and the house of David waxes stronger and stronger.

3. What have we done for others? Christ went about, continually doing good. Unless the same mind be in us we are none of his. "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widow in their affliction." The widow is an object of pity. Her affliction represents all who are troubled. The human race has cast off God and is without the Father. To visit them is to give aid and comfort. To this end we build asylums, hospitals and homes for the friendless, translate the Bible into many languages and send copies to all nations, and follow them with the missionaries. We carry bread to the homes of the hungry, and clothing to the naked. We visit the sick. We comfort the mourners. And Christ has promised to recognize this as done to himself. "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me." How many can say of the past year, "I have done what I could?"

Now let us look forward. What of the future? There is no way of judging the future but by the past. There is no lamp to guide us, but the lamp of experience. With individuals and families there will be changes in the present year. But with organic peoples history repeats itself.

1. Many will continue neglecting or rejecting Christ. Noah preached to the world of the ungodly for one hundred and twenty years, and yet only eight souls entered the ark. The rest were drowned. They believed not. In the United States more than half the people never enter a church, and yet there is no reason why every one should not know of the way of salvation by Jesus Christ. In this city it is presumed that all have heard of the great salvation by the blood of Christ, and yet three-fourths of the people never attend church. "How shall they escape who neglect so great salvation?" If you throw a rope to a drowning man, he grasps it and holds with a death-grip until rescued. Men are perishing in the sea of divine wrath. You throw them the rope of salvation, let down from heaven, but they will not take hold of the life-line. If the prison-doors were thrown open, there would be a rush of prisoners for liberty. Christ has opened the prison-doors and you invite them to come out and enjoy the glorious liberty of the children of God. But they prefer their bondage to your liberty. Nothing but the electric shock of the Spirit of God can awaken the sinner to a sense of his danger. Only the impulsive power of a new life can enable him to lay hold on eternal life. "It is the Spirit that quickeneth."

2. Some will believe and be saved. "A remnant shall be saved." The human family is in the Niagara rapids of the judicial process, which is whirling them on to the awful precipice, beneath which is the bottomless pit. A few are being rescued, but the majority are going down to eternal death. Out of 1,500,000,000 human beings in the world, 1,000,000,000 have never heard of Christ. Of the 500,000,000 who have heard the Gospel, 225,000,000 belong to the Church of Rome, and 85,000,000 to the Greek Church, and neither has a Gospel sufficient to save. There are 165,000,000 belonging to the Reformed churches. But taking away those who are religious only in name, there are not more than 30,000,000 left.

"Lord, are there few that be saved?" was the question of Christ's disciples. "Lord, who hath believed our report?" is the complaint which the prophet puts into the mouths of the early evangelists. The work of rescuing the perishing is not yet triumphant.

3. Many will be called hence to appear before God. Death is no respecter of persons. During the past year I have been called to officiate at the funeral of the infant, the girl and boy, the young man and woman, the middle-aged and the gray-headed. The old must die; the young may. We have no certain lease on life. More die under ten years than over. Thirty-five years is the average life. Only a few pass three-score-and-ten years. "What is your life? It is even a vapor, which appeareth for a time and then vanisheth away." Our days are a shadow which passeth soon away." "Our days are an hand-breadth." The human race passeth away at the rate of one per second. "Our days are swifter than a weaver's shuttle. One generation goeth and another cometh. "They break upon our sight," says an eloquent writer, "like waves of the sea, crowded, successive, continuous, flashing beneath the light of a moment, and audible only in their sudden breaking and dying upon an invisible shore." Of how many will it be true when called: "The harvest is past, the summer is ended, and I am not saved?" Let the watchword of this progressing year be: "Prepare to meet thy God."

Boston, Mass.

A NON-SECRET CONFEDERATION.

Quite recently, in Chicago, at the Annual National Convention of the Farmers' Alliances, steps were taken toward a confederation of agricultural unions throughout the United States. A definite plan of organization, intended to include the five prominent secret orders of this country, was adopted and a committee to secure its adoption by the other unions was appointed.

The new organization, to be called "The Farmers' Union," it is hoped by its framers, will meet with general approval. Persons at the head of the movement stated that they had received the tacit endorsement of the other four large agricultural organizations—the Farmers' Alliance and Industrial Union, the Grange, the Farmers' Mutual Benefit Association, and the Patrons of Industry.

The plan of the constitution adopted by the national convention here provides that the Farmers' Union shall be incorporated under the laws of Illinois. It is expressly provided that it shall be a non-secret organization. This is a most important provision, as it is admitted that the secret nature of many of the existing orders has kept out of their ranks a large and powerful element of the farming industry, particularly the church-supporting class opposed to secret societies. While in no way interfering with the secret regulations of the several federated orders, this central organization will be open and its ranks free to men who have scruples against joining secret orders.

Another important provision is that the federation shall be strictly non-partisan. Vast numbers of the farming element are violently opposed to the political character of certain of the orders, and while the federation is made for the express purpose of increasing the power of the agricultural element in the political and social movements of the country, it was generally admitted that partisan spirit would be an evil factor in the workings of the new body.

The new organization will admit to membership only practical farmers, but female members of a farmer's household may become members. The constitution and by-laws will be based upon the form of the Constitution of the United States and the plan of the general government in its legislative, executive, and judicial departments. Arbitration shall settle all disputes between the federating orders.

The federation will in no way interfere with the existing rights and rules of the five orders included. Each organization shall be encouraged to individual increase of strength.

A peculiar provision is that all new local societies may receive charters direct from the Farmers' Union, so that the central body will govern branches directly, as do the federating orders.

A plan will be provided whereby an expression of public sentiment upon leading questions of the day can be secured free from the influence of political campaigns and the heat of partisanship. This will be done by sending out a ballot similar to that of the Australian system, upon which a vote may be taken at home.

The specificially stated object of the federation is to promote social harmony and entertainment for the families of isolated farmers, to furnish the means for educational government necessary for better citizenship, more practical tillage of the soil, and a more thorough knowledge of the questions of government, of the laws of trade, and the relations of agriculture to other pursuits and occupations.

HIGHER CRITICISM GIVES THE LIE TO CHRIST.

Dr. Sanday, one of the divines of the Church of England, in a recent Bampton lecture, made an attack upon the Holy Scriptures, which may thus be summarized:

1. The Penteteuch, called by our Lord "Moses' writings," is not so, but of the "Exitic" period, hundreds of years after Moses. So our Lord is given the direct lie.

2. The Book of Deuteronomy, specially authenticated by our Lord as written by Moses, is a forgery of King Joshua's time.

3. The Historic Books are certainly not what the church has always believed them be.

4. The Book of Daniel, specially authenticated by our divine Lord, is a daring forgery of the time of Antiochus Epiphanes; in fact, as Dr. Pusey says, "if now written by Daniel, the writer must have lied on a most frightful scale!" (Lectures on Daniel, page 1.)

5. The Book of Proverbs later than Ezra.

6. False names put to Old Testament books.

7. The Second Epistle of St. Peter not written by the apostle, although Christendom has received it into the sacred canon as authentic. Of course if Dr. Sanday is right our Lord is wrong, and Christianity must go.—Father Ignatius, the "Anglican monk," in a Liverpool paper.

ANOTHER NEW POLITICAL SOCIETY.

An organization to oppose the A. P. A. has been started in Denver. It is called the National Society of Liberty and Loyalty. It has for its basis the exclusion of religious intolerance from public affairs. This society charges against the American Protective Association that it proscribes persons on account of their religious beliefs in both private and public affairs. One of the obligations (it is said) imposed upon its members is to proscribe members of the American Protective Association. This does not appear in their declaration of principles which we give below.

"We believe that all persons should be protected in their right to worship God after the dictates of their own consciences, as long as that worship is not in the nature of a violation of the Constitution and laws of the land. We believe that no person should be proscribed in either public or private life on account of religious belief or sectarian affiliations. We believe that any person or set or persons who do attempt to proscribe others on account of their religious belief or sectarian affiliations are enemies to the laws of the country and should be treated as such. We believe that the American people should rule and govern their country in accordance with the mandates and provisions of the American Constitution and American laws, and not after the rules of fanatics and bigots. We are opposed to any union of church and state and any sectarian interference with the public schools, and we pledge ourselves to use our utmost endeavors to keep the public schools free from all sectarian control or influence."

MORE "FACTS FROM WASHINGTON."

The National bank note circulation outstanding December 31, 1893, was $208,442,027. The circulation based on United States bonds decreased during December $2,502,804.

For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1895, the Secretary of the Treasury estimates that an appriation of $7,280,053 will be necessary to defray the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs. The Secretary has sent his estimate to Congress.

The summary of the mineral resources of the United States, just issued by the Chief of the Division of Mining Statistics and Technology of the Geological Survey, shows the total value of the mineral product of the United States for 1892 to have been $685,377,383, the highest ever known. The metals were valued at $304,775,379, non-metalic products, $370,607,864, and unspecified products, $10,000,000.

There are six ex-Cabinet officers in the Senate: Mr. Sherman was Secretary of the Treasury under President Hayes. Mr. Teller was Secretary of the Interior under President Arthur, and Mr. Chandler was Secretary of the Navy under President Arthur. Mr. Vilas was Secretary of the Interior and later Postmaster-General under President Cleveland. Mr. Proctor was Secretary of War under President Harrison, and Mr. Cameron Secretary of War under President Grant.

Stored in the eight vaults of the Treasury Department at Washington are 149,860,000 standard silver dollars; $11,500,000 gold coin; $333,000 fractional silver; $3,500,000 national bank notes received for redemption; $3,500,000 mixed moneys received daily; for daily use $1,000,000 of mixed moneys; $250,000 000 bonds held as security for national bank and $325,000,000 held as a reserve to replace worn and mutilated notes unfit for circulation.

WOMEN AS PHYSICIANS.

The first woman who was regularly graduated from a medical college was Elizabeth Blackwell. Her admission to the college in Geneva, N. Y., was secured by the students, to whom the faculty referred her application. They thought it a great joke, and the unanimous vote in her favor was received with uproarious demonstrations. The faculty, who had expected a different decision, reluctantly accepted it, and she was graduated in 1847. But for her clinical study she was compelled to go abroad, and after great difficulty was received at the "Maternite," in Paris, and as a personal favor was permitted some opportunities of visiting hospitals.

On her return from Europe she set to work to provide opportunities of clinical study for women, and with the assistance of generous friends to the enterprise, the New York Infirmary for Women and Children was established, and from this grew the Woman's Medical College of the New York Infirmary.

It is not yet fifty years since Dr. Blackwell received her degree of M. D. Now women physicians in the United States are numbered by the hundreds, and are welcomed everywhere, in many hospitals, in private families, and, when they can write well, in the columns of medical journals. They are invited to consultations; they are successful lecturers; they are members of county, State, and national medical associations.

In Switzerland, in Scotland, in Italy, in France, and recently in England, women are admitted to the profession of medicine. Germany will not permit women to study in her universities, and Russia denies them admission on the ground that the study of medicine leads to Nihilism.

A great field is open to women as medical missionaries. Not only are they a blessing to the people to which they are sent, but to their own countrymen when traveling in foreign parts. It was Dr. Mary Bradford who saved the life of the late lamented Theodore Child when he was seized with cholera in Persia on his way to India. All other doctors had fled from the plague, but she heroically remained at her post.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The death of President Shafer—Lucy Stone—College matters—"A good day to start on"—Trinity church—The A. P. A.—"Greater Boston."

Our New England Januarys are proverbial for giving us a breathing spell between the December frosts and the howling snowstorms of February and March, called from time whereto memory runneth not, "the January thaw." It is not always an agreeable season. The mingling of snow and slush under-foot, and the raw, damp air, like a belated down-east April, gives you all the prose of winter without its poetry; but sometimes, and noticeably this season, the interim has been so spring-like, that a violet peeping out of the dry grass at one's feet, or the song of a bluebird in the distance, would have hardly come as a surprise.

"This beautiful day is one she would have enjoyed," was the opening remark made by Dr. Mackenzie in his funeral address over Wellesley's dead president. It was in truth a day of rare beauty, like an amethyst set in gold on the heart of winter. Perhaps the most touching part of the service was when two of the Alumnea, each bearing a basket of violets—her favorite flower—came forward and emptied them on the casket in a mass of white and purple fragrance—fit symbol of the life so suddenly, yet so beautifully ended. Miss Shafer was a woman of very attractive personality, graceful and dignified in her bearing, yet with such an unassuming manner and cordial smile that the stranger felt at ease with her in a moment. While she may have lacked the personal magnetism which made her predecessor, Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, so popular, no woman instructor in America surpassed her for rare intellectual power and executive ability. She was clear-headed and methodical, accomplishing a great deal of work, but so noiselessly that one saw only the results; undemonstrative, yet deeply loved with that lasting affection which is built on a strong foundation of respect. No sight could have been more impressive than that of the senior class as they walked, two and two in solemn procession, to the train which was to bear away all that remained of their beloved president, to its last resting place at Oberlin; and certainly the higher education never paid a more fitting or beautiful tribute to the dignity of labor than in the selection of workingmen, employed about the college, for pall-bearers. Her mantle will probably fall on Miss Frances Ellen Lord, who now holds the position of president pro tem. Miss Lord has always taken a very deep interest in foreign missions—several members of her family being engaged in the work—and her accession to the presidential chair will be likely to stimulate still further the missionary spirit for which Wellesley has always been noted.

"There were others to take her place," says the press of Lucy Stone, referring to her sweet, motherly presence, and calm, forceful speech, now missed for the first time from the legislative hearings on Woman Suffrage. Yes; to take her place, but scarcely to fill it. Such as she cannot fail to leave a void. There will be many to do brave and noble work for their sex. There can never be but one Lucy Stone.

The remonstrants failed to appear, but announced their purpose to mail to each member a copy of their last year's argument, requesting that it be carefully read. While the advocates of Woman Suffrage, as represented by the names on the petition, are a hundred thousand strong, including some of the largest and best known organizations, the other side is either afraid or ashamed to meet their opponents openly, and so have concluded this year to keep under cover—a safe, perhaps, but surely not a brave policy. Miss Spence of Australia, an all-around reformer, who went there when she was a child and literally "grew up with the country," scored a good point when she denied that America is a democracy where half the people have no representation. In far-off Australia women have had municipal suffrage for twenty years. It is said that the committee will report favorably on the petition, and as Gov. Greenhalge spoke a good word for it in his message, its friends have much cause to be encouraged, though in view of past failures it will not be wise for them to indulge too confident hopes.

It is refreshing to chronicle, instead of a base-ball contest, a public debate between Harvard and Yale on the question whether independent action in politics is preferable to party allegiance; Yale taking the affirmative, that independent political action is necessary if we would have patriots instead of politicians. Harvard won, though the moral advantage was with its opponents; because perhaps its speakers had more of the ability "to make the worse appear the better cause." Harvard, by the way, has had so many large bequests and endowments that most people have supposed it to be beyond the need of retrenchment, and will learn with surprise that the University has been obliged to dismiss six of its corps of instructors, owing to quite a considerable deficit in the college accounts.

Somebody asks, "What is to become of all the teachers that our women's colleges are sending forth?" This is a needless anxiety. The times have changed when to give a girl an education was the same thing as binding her for life to the profession of "teaching the young idea how to shoot." The percentage is growing larger, every year, of graduates who seek other callings where the question of sex is not so large a factor in the pay received. Think of the men-teachers of Boston getting an average salary of $246.06 a month, and the women teachers only $70.69!

"I expect to begin me training on Christmas day, don't yer know," Mitchell, the prize-fighter, is reported as saying. "I think that is a first-rate day to start on." Which is a fair illustration of the manner in which the supposed day of Christ's birth is regarded by the class which patronize saloons and prize-fights. This may do to refer to when Easter comes, and Easter millinery is displayed in the shop-windows, and the world dons its most fashionable attire and goes to church to hear an Easter sermon, on much the same principle, though not quite so frankly stated, that "it is a good day to start on." The plane of the prize-fighter and the woman who lives for style, shows about the same level after all, viewed from the heavenly stand-point.

Trinity church is much exercised over the question whether it shall or shall not accept a reredos, —that is, an elaborately carved back-piece to the altar—which one of Boston's society leaders proposes to give. As this piece of Romish bric-a-brac will cost about $30,000 one cannot help the thought that if the money was used for the poor, instead, it would be much more in accordance with the spirit of Christianity's Founder. Low-church sentiment has always prevailed at Trinity, and the feeling is strong against accepting a gift which will tend to draw it into line with ritualistic churches.

While it is needless to say that in common with most of the Cynosure readers, I do not favor the A. P. A., believing that there are better ways to combat Rome than by the dark-lantern methods of the secret lodge, I would like to know, with the Woman's Voice, why, at the recent legislative hearing in regard to the taxing of untaxed property, every member who favored such taxation should be asked if he was a member of the A. P. A.? Why the A. P. A., any more than the Masons, Odd-fellows or any other secret order?

A bill has been presented to the Legislature looking towards the creation of a greater Boston by annexing all the cities and towns within a radius of ten miles. But as the initiative step must be taken by the outside town or city, and these communities are not at all eager to be swallowed up in this wholesale way, the best part of their citizens being likely to fight a project which would bring them under a government controlled by Rome and the saloon, it does not look as if this ambitious project is likely to be realized very speedily. If Boston desires to enlarge her borders and become a big municipality, the quickest way to secure her ends will be to adopt no-license, and bid Rome keep her hands off the political machine. Otherwise she must be content with her present circumference. ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

It is estimated by the Canadian authorities that at least 100,000 pounds of opium, refined in British Columbia, is annually smuggled across the border into the United States.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 24, 1894.

The action of the House of Representatives in voting to drop the bounty on sugar produced in the United States, and to put refined sugar on the free list, is accepted by many as an indication that the income tax will be adopted by about the same vote. Those who think that way argue that the vote in favor of the amendment of the tariff bill, which was voted down, to substitute a tax on raw foreign sugar for the bounty on domestic sugar, represented the entire opposition to the income tax; their idea being that a tax on foreign sugar would have raised all the revenue needed, making the income tax unnecessary. It is now claimed by those who favor the income tax, but disputed by its opponents, that 45 Senators will support it. The failure of the attempt to amend the tariff bill by imposing a duty on iron and coal excited no surprise.

Senators are receiving personal letters from all classes of citizens and from all sections of the country asking that speedy action be taken on the tariff bill in the Senate, the idea of merchants, manufacturers, farmers and mechanics alike being that it is best to end the uncertainty as speedily as possible, in order that they may know and prepare for whatever changes are to be made.

There is a feeling of regret among those interested in the business of the Supreme Court that President Cleveland should have nominated Mr. Wheeler H. Peckham, of New York, to the vacancy in that tribunal. This is not because of any general objection to Mr. Peckham personally, but because of the knowledge that his confirmation, if secured at all, will only be after a protracted and bitter struggle, while many important cases before that court are waiting to be heard by a full bench.

Rev. Dr. Reynolds, of Vare, Armenia, who has for twenty-five years been engaged in missionary work in Asiatic Turkey, has just been giving Washingtonians some very interesting information about people and things in Armenia. To give some idea of how far behind these people are in the progressive civilization of the age, he mentions that to travel from Constantinople to Vare, about the same distance as from New York to Chicago, it requires twenty-four days. He told of the progress made by missionaries among the Armenians, who, although nominally Christians, have but little knowledge of the Bible, many of them none at all. He says the Armenian priests are in many cases ignorant men who only mislead their followers, instead of teaching them the doctrines of Christianity, many of the people before they came in contact with the missionaries having regarded the term "Christian" as having no other or higher meaning than that of being used to designate an Armenian and to distinguish him from a Turkish Mohammedan.

Rev. Dr. F. E. Clark, president of the United Christian Endeavor Society, and widely known as the originator of that powerful and rapidly-growing organization, has been in Washington for several days. He delivered his new lecture, and a very entertaining one it is, on "A Trip Around the World" Monday evening. He started his hearers from San Francisco, taking them, by the aid of some excellent pictures, to Honolulu, New Zealand, through the largest cities of Australia, to China, Japan, India, Palestine, Egypt, Southern Europe and England. A unique feature of the lecture occurred just as he got his hearers back to America. The words of "My Country, 'Tis of Thee" were thrown upon the screen and the entertainment ended by the audience rising and singing the well-known words.

Treasury officials say they feel no uneasiness over the proposed attempt to secure a restraining order from the courts to prevent the issue of bonds announced by Secretary Carlisle for February 1. Subscriptions have already been received for more than the amount to be issued, at a figure that will make them practically 3 per cent bonds. The opinion is expressed by shrewd financiers that unless Congress shall take speedy action to provide the money needed Secretary Carlisle will have to issue another $50,000,000 of bonds before the first of July.

"Church Unity" has of late been very much discussed by our ministers of all denominations, and a number of them have preached able sermons on the subject. That public interest in this very important matter is on the increase is certain, and while nearly every one desires it to be accomplished every one recognizes the great difficulties that must first be overcome. But the difficulties, while great, are not insurmountable, and they are not to be compared with the advantages that would be obtained by "church unity."

REFORM NEWS.

FROM THE NEW ENGLAND SECRETARY.

BOSTON, Jan. 22, 1894.

The work of education is going quietly forward in this city. Just now I am distributing 10,000 circulars containing the gist of Bro. Stephen Merritt's address at Utica and the testimonies of 16 prominent ministers and Christian workers.

The Christian Alliance begins a four-days' meeting quite near us, tomorrow, which will give an excellent opportunity to reach the leaders in that great and growing movement. Dr. Simpson, Stephen Merritt, and distinguished speakers are on the program.

The W. C. T. U. held their annual meeting last evening in Shawmut Congregationalist church. The address was by Mrs. Fessenden, and for beauty of diction, perspicuity of argument, aptness in illustration, fidelity to the truth, and depth of pathos, it ranked among the most eloquent and finished platform addresses to which I ever listened. Mrs. Dr. A. J. Gordon presided, with her accustomed motherly aptitude, which, without display, sees and does the right thing at the right time. In the secretary's report of topics discussed by the union during the year the relation of the secret lodge to the drink habit was not omitted.

Joseph Cook gave his 235th address in the Boston Monday Lecture course. Major Brewer, with his popular Salvation Army corps, held a meeting at the same hour near by, but despite all attractions elsewhere, Boston's favorite lecturer was greeted with a full house and accorded hearty welcome. He spoke for an hour and a half with all the vigor of mind and body which made him famous twenty years ago, with added power of treasures and experience gathered in two decades of travel and unremitting research. Few men have ever attained such an influence over the most cultured and discriminating minds in Boston, or held a leadership so long; and very few, if any, have used their influence or held that leadership more unselfishly, or with a higher devotion to the weal of society, the state and the Church of Christ, than Joseph Cook; and it must be gratifying to him to know that his ability is recognized and appreciated by his fellow-citizens.

Two young business men called this afternoon for "Light in Masonry." We spent the afternoon studying the system together. Both were church-members, and one of them, I am confident, knew more of the inside of the lodge than he was willing to confess; and I have grave suspicions that both had worn the hoodwink and cable-tow. An occasional look, or word, and the evidently guarded manner which characterized their inquiries, left little room for doubt. There is always such a difference between the bearing of a slave and a freeman that it is not generally difficult to detect the man who has surrendered his private judgment and liberty of speech for lodge benefits. Departing at 5:30 they promised to call again. As the following is from Charlestown, where the gentlemen above reside, it may be read with interest in this connection: "I had a little lodge experience myself, having been once a member of Knights of Honor. After fourteen years of church membership, and six years after I was soundly converted and regenerated, I was convinced of my entire need of sanctification, and the baptism of the Holy Ghost. After long fasting and continuous prayer, ending with an all-night wrestling with the angel, God graciously bestowed this gift upon even me, and taught me the faith, and then gave me THE Gift. All glory to God! At this time the question of the lodge had never occurred to me as wrong, but the first meeting of the lodge I attended I came out of it with the loss of the sweet consciousness of Christ within. But that night, after much prayer, God restored the gentle Dove. I repeated this experience the two following lodge-nights, before I perceived the cause of my darkness. The Spirit then showed me that I could not be unequally yoked together unbelievers, and I immediately left the lodge. I had had no instruction except from the Spirit and the Word of God, and I believe every soul that is open toward God will be led out of all manner of secretism as surely as I was. Glory to God for a revelation of Jesus Christ to my heart that fills every want. Yours in perfect love, J. C. BRIGGS."

JAN. 25.—A four-days' meeting of the Christian Alliance is in session in Berkeley Temple. It is largely attended, and the addresses and all the meetings are "in the power of the Holy Spirit." The secret lodges have not been overlooked. Bro. Merritt reaffirmed his testimony at Utica, and I have circulated it on printed slips freely, with his approval and that of the management. Bro. Merritt does not give a positive promise to speak at the Philadelphia convention, but says he now knows of no reason why he cannot attend and speak.

JAN. 26.—The Lord is in his holy temple. His Word is having free course, and the children are being comforted and fed at the Master's table. The house was crowded last evening when Bro.

CORRESPONDENCE.

VIEWS OF A FARMER.

UNIONVILLE, Mo., January 20, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I shall be very glad to hear of the whole of "Camp 20," with the Governor, being caught in the Cronin murder trial, and hope that it may be the golden wedge by which all the secret societies in this government will be rent asunder.

What about your thousands of poor for which you are providing free sustenance, but at the farmers' expense? Your city men are forcing us to sell our products for less than we can afford to take. To prove this, look at the millions of our farmers mortgaging their farms to get money for carrying on their work. Have we not yet sufficient public lands to make a few millions of homes, and why do not your starved ones go and work for a living, as we do? If you have so many men who have nothing to do, send me a good stout, active young man, and I will pay him thirteen dollars a month until spring, and then I will give him sixteen dollars through the summer. I very much need a hand and cannot get one.

I lost my health in the army, and have become a charge to my family. I ought to have a pension, but I am told by friends that I will never get it unless I join the G. A. R. (If I were a Mason or an Odd-fellow, the effect would be the same.) But I tell my friends that if I have, for that, to give up my manhood, my true American liberties and privileges, sell my soul to the devil, and pay all the expense myself, I do not want a pension.

It is strange that so many hundreds of thousands of working men are dragged about by secret societies till they know nothing, and thereby become a burden to the free and industrious classes; but ere long the entire working masses must yield to the money power; and then our slavery will be a hundred times worse than Negro slavery ever was. I think that the Cynosure is doing more and better than all the other papers to put down this tyranny, and hope that God will add his blessing and give you renewed strength until all the fabric of man's contrivance shall fall, and Christ's kingdom shall be built up in the world. R. A. CULLOR.

"ARMENIAN REVOLUTIONISTS."

THE INDEPENDENT, 130 Fulton St., N. Y., January 24, 1894.

William F. Davis, Esq., Chelsea, Mass.,

MY DEAR SIR:—Your paper or letter on Armenian revolutionists has been on my desk for some time. In reply I can only say that Dr. Hamlin is by no means our sole authority for our statements. You may rest assured that these statements are not the "cruel slander of oppressed and pitifully persecuted Armenians" from the Turks. We know whereof we speak. That the Armenians suffer heavily no one realizes better than do we, and for that suffering there are none who feel a deeper sympathy. At the same time for a large part of this suffering they have themselves to thank. To publish names would perhaps hardly be wise. They could be given, however, were it necessary, but for the present we must claim our right to suppress them.

We would call your attention to a few facts easily verified. Turkey is a country of considerable size; the Armenians are scattered over the length and breadth of it. The Turkish government is the same whether in the north or south or east or west. As a matter of fact these complaints of excessive persecution come almost solely from one section, that section having Marsovan and Yuzgat as centers. The most intense suffering is not however in that section, but in the section bordering on the Kurdistan mountains, about the city of Erzrum. If you go farther south you will find the sections about Van, Harput, Cesarea, Adana, Aintab, where, while there is much suffering, there is no complaint whatever of persecution. Furthermore in this very section about Marsovan there are thousands and thousands of Greeks. If the Turkish government were persecuting Armenians because they are Christians, they would scarcely let the Greeks go without similar dealing. There is suffering in the Greek villages of that section, but there is no complaint of persecution. Again, any one who knows thoroughly the country from the Ægean Sea to the Persian border knows that the bitterest suffering is effected not by the Turks, but by the Kurdish tribes of the mountains, and that the Turkish villages of Central Asia Minor suffer from the oppression of the Turkish government very nearly, if not quite as much, as do the Christian villages. Some claim that they suffer more. That the great mass of Armenians are directly implicated in such principles as are advocated by this party, no one who knows them believes. At the same time there is no doubt in the minds of those best acquainted that this is practically the plan adopted by this party. Furthermore, it is a fact well known within certain circles that these were the very means adopted in Bulgaria and which resulted in the famous Bulgarian atrocities. It is a simple matter of fact that the first atrocities committed in Bulgaria were by the Bulgarians themselves upon the Moslems, and that they were instigated to do this by Russian emissaries. Men have been captured in the city of Marsovan known to be Russian agents. One of them, the leader, was shot in the capture; the others were arrested and some of them put to death. It does not seem to us best to state all of these things in public. There is a great deal about this whole matter that would only be misapprehended if it were published. It does not seem to us that it is asking very much of American citizens that they trust men of their own nationality who have given their lives in service for these same people, rather than men who are certainly interested parties, and, in some respects, are themselves ignorant. We could go on to much greater length, but it is perhaps not necessary. Yours very truly, EDITOR OF THE INDEPENDENT.

MT. WASHINGTON, CHELSEA, Mass., Jan. 22, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I sent an article to the (New York) Independent eighteen days ago, which they do not notice. Their editorial (here quoted) drew it forth. I enclose both to thee. . . . . Fair play is all I want to see. Sincerely thy brother in Christ, WM. F. DAVIS.

ARMENIAN REVOLUTIONISTS.

A few weeks since we called attention to the comments in President Cleveland's message with regard to Armenian revolutionary influences at work in this country. Since then we have received from Dr. Cyrus Hamlin a statement confirming in detail what has been generally known to be the fact, that there is a regular revolutionary party, whose center is in Athens, and which has branches in every village and city of Armenia and also in the colonies. It is also represented in this country by a man named Nishan Garabedian, of Worcester, Mass.

The object of this party, according to the statements made, is to prepare the way for Russia's entrance to take possession of Asia Minor. The means by which they expect to accomplish this is the organization of bands all over the Empire, who will watch opportunities to kill Turks and Kurds, set fire to the villages, and then make their escape to the mountains. The result of this will be that the enraged Moslems will rise and fall upon the defenseless Armenians, and slaughter them with such barbarities that Russia will enter, in the name of humanity and Christian civilization, and take possession. When such a scheme was denounced as atrocious beyond conception, the answer was made: "It appears so to you, no doubt; but we Armenians are determined to be free. Europe listened to the Bulgarian horrors and made Bulgaria free. She will listen to our cry when it goes up in the shrieks and blood of millions of women and children." There was much more to the same purpose, for which we have not space here. It is sufficient to say that this party has numerous representatives in this country who, while denying membership, are yet making every effort to stir the sympathy of the Christian communities, especially the Sunday-schools and Christian Endeavor Societies, and foment hostility to the Turkish Government.

Dr. Hamlin enters an earnest appeal, which is endorsed by the Massachusetts Home Missionary Society, that all persons who seek to befriend Armenians should be careful not to be in any way implicated in such matters. We cannot enforce this appeal too earnestly. Readers of the Independent know well that we have no sympathy with oppression, whether conducted by the Turkish, Russian, Austrian or any other government. We believe heartily in using every legitimate means to secure the remission of unjust taxation and release from oppression; but such means as those endorsed by this revolutionary party, in regard to which we have information entirely apart from Dr. Hamlin's statements, of believing, are being used in many places in Turkey, we believe to be productive only of harm.—New York Independent, Jan. 4.

THE ANSWER.

EDITOR OF THE INDEPENDENT:—In the editorial columns of thy journal of this date I notice an article entitled "Armenian Revolutionists."

If an Armenian revolutionary party is engaged in such "atrocious" undertaking as seeking to infuriate the Turks and Kurds to rise to a general massacre of defenceless Armenian women and children, so as to deliver Armenia from the misrule of Islam into the tyranny of Russia, of course we all ought to "be careful not to be in any way implicated in such matters."

But if our venerable ex-missionary and educator, Cyrus Hamlin, and others whose testimony thou hast accepted, are giving, in the columns of the Independent, Turkey's cruel slander of oppressed and pitilessly persecuted Armenians, it were better that the names of the Turkish authors of these stabs and thrusts were published, than that the names of men whom we have been taught to love as missionaries should be made oracles of nineteenth century Mohammedanism.

The Independent will do us a real service if its editor will reprint, from authentic Armenian sources, their official or quasi official utterances of any one of the four revolutionary parties who desire earnestly the deliverance of Armenia from its present horrible treatment, which will justify the assertion, charging one of these parties with provoking the wholesale slaughter of their own kith and kin for the sake of getting under the hated Russian yoke.

Until thou hast published such evidence, multitudes of Armenians will declare, and multitudes who are not Armenians will find it hard to disbelieve them, that this story is of Turkish origin, too easily believed by timid missionaries, and not carefully sifted by the editor of a great religious newspaper.

Every hour I meet intelligent Armenians, who receive printed and written advices continually from every branch of their scattered people, who assert that no Armenian revolutionary party in the world has adopted or declared such a policy as the editorial article in thy journal of this date here charges upon the party having its headquarters in Athens. If these brethren are deceived they wish to be undeceived. Wilt thou give us more light? Sincerely thy servant in Christ,

WM. F. DAVIS.

The New Volume of Pen and Pencil Series.

WELSH PICTURES Drawn with Pen and Pencil.

By D. Lewis Jones, Morris Jones, Edward Ffoulkes, H. Elvet Lewis, D. Tyssil Evans, D. Davies and O. M. Edwards. Edited by Richard Lovett, M. A. With many Illustrations. Imperial 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, boxed..... 3.20

"'Welsh pictures' is the work of ten Welshmen, among whom illustrating the beauties of Wales has been parcelled out according to the special familiarity of each. The result is a pleasing volume."—London Times.

THE EARTHLY FOOTPRINTS OF OUR RISEN LORD, Illumined.

A continuous narrative of the Four Gospels according to The Revised Version, with introduction by Rev. John Hall, D. D. Illustrated by 113 full-page half tone re-productions. Small 4to, cloth.....net 1.50
Gilt edge, with silk book mark, boxed.....net 2.00
Full morocco, flexible, gilt edges, round corners, boxed.....net 3.75

Pictures reflecting the best in sacred art from Raphael to the present day are scattered profusely through the book.

"To many the life of the Christ will be a new book in this form. Though beyond the introduction it contains no word except what is found in the four Gospels, yet when read continuously, without the breaks necessarily made by the different stories of the four evangelists, the narrative takes on new force and lifelikeness. The very fact that this is not our usual method of reading the Word will give it a new reality."—Golden Rule.

A GIFT OF LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

THE CHRISTIAN LIFE SERIES.

THE GREAT LONDON DAILIES.

By H. W. Massingham. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, cloth..... 1.00

Very welcome to all who like to look behind the scenes and see how the great London dailies are worked.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects.

By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

LODGE NOTES.

MASONIC.

The Victoria Freemason informs us that the letter "G" within a square and compass, which in many American and English lodges is regarded as a species of Masonic talisman, is not held as such in Continental Europe, where its place is correctly assumed by the blazing star. That may be all right for Europe, but we, as American Masons, are taught to make use of it for a more noble and glorious purpose. By it we are ever reminded of the presence among us of T. G. A. O. T. U., and as a symbol of his great name we suspend it in our lodges where every eye can see it. The letter in the F. C. degree is still more significant.—American Tyler.

Freemasonry in northern China is as actively at work as elsewhere. There are a district Grand Lodge, fully manned, eight Craft lodges and one lodge of instruction under English, Scotch and Massachusetts constitutions, three R. A. Chapters, one Rose Croix Chapter, a lodge of the Royal Order of Scotland, a Preceptory and a Consistory. There are likewise a Masonic charity fund and two public school scholarships.

Eccentric Lodge, No. 2,488, was consecrated in London on Oct. 20. It is composed of men of distinction in literature and art, and will probably be another "class lodge," which have become numerous among our English brethren.

ODD-FELLOWS.

It is reported that two members of Prospect Rebekah Lodge, of Albany, N. Y., who imagined that they could do as they pleased, and as tellers at an election declared candidates elected or defeated at their will, irrespective of votes cast, have been expelled from the order.

The suit of Mrs. Rebecca Emmons against Hope Lodge, Independent Order of Odd-fellows, was decided on Nov. 29th, in the Superior Court, Wilmington, Del., in favor of the plaintiff. Mrs. Emmons brought suit to recover $200 death benefit on her husband's account. The jury gave a verdict of $243.80 and costs.

ROYAL ARCANUM.

A Royal Arcanum Dining Club is proposed in Philadelphia, to encourage sociability, fraternity and good fellowship. It is hoped to start with one hundred members.

[Why don't they go home and dine with their families?—OFFICE-BOY.]

The earlier symptoms of dyspepsia, such as distress after eating, heartburn, and occasional headaches, should not be neglected. Take Hood's Sarsaparilla and be cured.

Hood's Pills are the best family cathartic and liver medicine. Harmless, reliable, sure.

It Pays.

It pays to read the papers, especially your own family paper, for often in this way good business opportunities are brought to your attention. For instance, B F. Johnson & Co., of Richmond, Va., are now advertising, offering paying positions to parties who engage with them, devoting all or any part of their time to their business interests. It might pay you to write to them.

"Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup for Children Teething" softens the gums, reduces inflammation, allays pain and cures wind colic. 25c a bottle.

United Presbyterians among our readers will be glad to learn that the Midland of Omaha is about to remove to Chicago. This will answer the most common and seemingly only objection to it—"too far west." The Midland is newsy, spicy and sound, liberal and loyal and patriotic and progressive; it excels in giving the news of its own denomination, in supporting the reforms of the day and in advocating home missions. Send for a free sample copy. Address the Midland Publishing Co. Its regular price is $1.50, but to one of our old subscribers who becomes a new subscriber to the Midland, both papers will be sent by us for $2.50. To one who becomes a new subscriber to both, the Cynosure and Midland, the papers will cost for one year only $2.00. Address, Christian Cynosure, 221 W. Madison street.

'FREEDOM from the aches, pains, and weaknesses peculiar to womanhood comes with Doctor Pierce's Favorite Prescription. First it relieves them; then it cures them. Have a little patience, perhaps, if they're serious. The troubles that come slowly have to go slowly: but go they will, if you'll faithfully use the "Prescription," and they'll go permanently.

For every "female complaint" and derangement, or in any "run-down" and exhausted condition of the female system, this medicine is the only remedy so safe and certain that it can be guaranteed. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in the case of every tired or afflicted woman, she'll have her money back. Chorea, St. Vitus's Dance, Nervous and General Debility, Sleeplessness and kindred ailments promptly relieved and cured by it.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 1, 1894.

FREEMASONRY AS A POLITICAL FACTOR.

The necessity that exists for politicians to consider the influence of Freemasonry as a potent factor in their success or defeat has many illustrations.

Stephen A. Douglas, in a speech at Morris, Ill., scored the Know-nothings, and likened them to Freemasons, upon whom he charged the murder of William Morgan; yet, at a later date, Douglas himself joined this red-handed, secret fraternity, that he might gain the political position which he coveted.

In a Masonic hall, a few blocks from the Cynosure office, John A. Logan took the higher degrees of Freemasonry, just at the time when it seemed likely that he would be the next Republican nominee for President of the United States,

All men may not join the Freemasons to gain the direct help of that fraternity, but rather to secure protection from its assaults in the dark. Owen Lovejoy told the late President Blanchard that had it not been for the timely inteference of a friend who was a Mason he would have been slaughtered, politically, by a "black-coat" put upon him by a Masonic lodge and communicated to every lodge in the State. His friend met the conspiracy against Mr. Lovejoy's character in a lodge in Chicago, to which the secret communication had been forwarded, and the conspiracy failed in its design to destroy its victim. Had it not been for the influence of his Masonic friend, Mr. Lovejoy would never have known of this dastardly attempt to effect his political ruin.

PENSIONS FOR "CONFEDERATES."

Representative Moses, of Georgia, from the Congressional Committee on Pensions, has reported to the House, with the recommendation that it pass, a bill repealing so much of the pension law as provides that no money on account of pension shall be paid to any person, or to the widow, children, or heirs of any deceased person, who in any manner voluntarily engaged in or aided or abetted the late rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Section 4 of Article 14 of the Federal Constitution reads as follows: "The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts iucurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States, nor any State, shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims, shall be held illegal and void."

The proposed change in the pension law is not designed to conflict with either the statute or the constitutional provision on which it is based. It merely proposes to pay pensions to such Confederates, or their widows, as served in the United States army and navy before the rebellion—in the Indian or Mexican wars—acquiring physical disabilities in such legitimate service. Mr. Moses claims that but few such cases now exist, and to hose who survive, he thinks, it would be but an act of justice. What action Congress may take in this matter remains to be seen.

"THE TWILIGHT JUDGMENTS OF THIS WORLD."

If I killed Alice Martin—the woman I dearly loved, the woman I loved so much that I would almost commit a crime for her—I pray Almighty God, in this, my last minute on earth, to send me to hell and keep me there through all eternity!

Such was the solemn expression of George H. Painter, last Friday, as he stood beneath the gallows on which he perished.

Painter was not a saint. The son of a Methodist minister, and once a respectable business man, happy in his married life, he started on his career with fair prospects of living a useful, honorable citizen. But reverses overtook him. His wife died and he became a profligate and the associate of evil men and women. Alice Martin was his mistress. and, as usual in such alliances, their life of sin was chequered with bickerings and jealousy.

That he loved her we learn from his own statement. She was murdered nearly two years ago, and Painter was arrested for killing her. On his trial for this crime he was found guilty, evidence entirely circumstantial indicating that their quarrels had been observed, and that near the time when she was killed he was seen in that vicinity. On evidence no stronger than this Painter was found guilty and sentenced to capital punishment. From first to last he pleaded innocence. Friends believing him to be so, labored so faithfully in his behalf that twice the Governor granted him a reprieve. In the meantime every effort was made to fasten the crime upon some one besides the condemned man; and it is singular that evidence quite as distinct as that which brought Painter to the gallows tended to fix the murder of Alice Martin upon another man with whom she had been intimate, and who was said to have openly quarreled with her just previous to her death. Many citizens became deeply interested in saving Painter from the gallows; but the Governor at last determined not to interfere again with the judgment of the court—even refusing to commute the sentence of the prisoner to imprisonment for life.

The execution of Painter was a horrible tragedy. The rope broke with his weight and he was virtually bereft of life by the fall. A second time he was suspended and dropped, to satisfy the demands of the law; but only few believe that he was not a corpse when the drop fell the second time.

Thousands more believe that he died innocent of the murder for which he was executed.

Two lessons are forcibly taught in this brief narrative:

That the unconverted sinner is always in danger among his evil associates.

That circumstantial evidence alone should never be allowed to bring men to the gallows. Murder, especially, ought to be proven beyond a peradventure before a death sentence should be pronounced.

Another lesson taught by this event is the danger of committing frightful injustice under laws providing for the capital punishment of criminals. Human life is always worth saving until its future happiness is secured by conversion. It was Bulwer who put into the mouth of one of his characters this apothegm: "The very worst use you can make of a man is to hang him." His reformation is worth a thousand cruel executions.

ANOTHER "PATRIOTIC ORDER."

In the Chicago Tribune appeared the following advertisement:

An incorporated native American secret society, patriotic and beneficial, desires to reach those unknown to us in all parts of the United States. Any one holding any allegiance in temporal affairs as above, State or national government, or married to one that does, is not eligible. Address P. O. ——, Chicago.

A note, requesting further information, sent to the advertiser's address, brought a very reticent messenger and a pink pamphlet entitled: "Objects of the A. O. of M. N. S. of the State of Illinois and United States of America." Its "preamble" is as follows: "This order is known as the A. O. of the M. N. S. Its aims are: Unfailing patriotism; the preservation of the free principles of the United States of America; the encouragement of scientific investigation, morality, charity and benevolence. Its constitution and method of government is different from other societies formed for a similar purpose, and it is believed will be more effective. Unlike other societies, its highest officers, at stated periods, are elected by the direct votes of all its members. We seek for members only those who love their country first and seek its welfare before their own. We believe there are many of this class; if you are one of these come among us, there is work for you to perform. The order is incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois. Its funds are not dissipated in useless expenses, and thus accumulate for use when needed to accomplish its aims. Only native American men and women, 21 years of age, or over, are eligible. Our requirements: Patriotism in every sense of the word; to stand by the Constitution of the United States of America and its Declaration of Independence; to uphold our free school system; to visit and care for the sick, especially a brother and his family; to stand by a brother and his family in time of trouble; to protect the character of a brother's family, wife, father, mother, brother, or sister; to do unto others as you would that others should do unto you; to do all in your power to secure work for a brother out of employment; to aid and assist in the maintenance of law and order, without expense to municipal or State government. Ideas the order seeks to inculcate: Independence; patriotism; progress, morality and fellowship."

This is all we know of this new secret claimant for the time, money and allegiance of those who are likely to be misled by its specious inducements. Will any reader coversant with its workings, send us such additional information relating to it as may be deemed essential for a better understanding of its import? It has something about it that reminds one of the cat hidden in the meal-tub to fool rats.

CHICAGO'S GODLESS THOUSANDS.

The picture drawn by Mr. Charles E. Simmons of Oak Park, Ill., in the Northwestern Christian Advocate, of Chicago's godless thousands is replete with saddened interest: "In the city of Chicago," he writes, "there are fifteen square miles of densely populated territory that is practically godless. The people who inhabit these districts are not simply indifferent to God's offered mercy, to his claims upon them and to the church, but they are open and avowed enemies. If not adherents of a corrupt and idolatrous church they are completely alienated from any church. They believe the church to be in league with, if not the chief support of, the capitalists whom they look upon as their natural enemies. These people are by no means sunk as low as the inhabitants of slums or as that social outlaw, the tramp. They live in families. Their children attend school a little. Most of them prefer to work when work can be had. Many would be glad to be better and to do better, but they don't know how, and most have lost heart in a struggle in which they have had no help. Their lives are a joyless, well-nigh comfortless struggle for a bare subsistence. Some may be measurably content with their lot because they have never known, and have ceased to hope, for any better fate; but in the hearts of most of them there is a bitter discontent. They are deadly bombs ready to explode at any moment." This extract appears in an article commending the proposed "forward movement" in the M. E. church, which shall "make a real and radical advance in its methods of promoting the growth of Christ's kingdom." Referring to the godless people whom he describes, he says: "Plant a church in the midst of such people, and it will remain empty. A mission dispensing only the preached Word would do little. They must be reached through the personal ministrations of Christ's servants in their homes; through provision made for their bodily needs; for the care and education of their children; by introducing into their lives innocent joys and pleasures; by sympathetic words; by kindly help in time of sorest need; in short, by such methods as are plainly inculcated by our Saviour's example and teaching."

Do the other churches of Chicago propose to let the Methodists have this field of labor to themselves?

THE PRESS AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

A syndicate of writers has been formed to furnish essays for a whole year to all weekly newspapers who are willing to assume the expense. As the distribution of these articles is more or less extensive, their cost to each paper is comparatively light. Of the fifty-two announced for publication during 1894, ten are upon religious and theological subjects; eight discuss civil and political questions; nine deal with sociological problems; five with problems of child-life; ten with the evidences of Christianity; five with educational questions, and five with matters of reform. We have looked through the list with considerable interest, and discover that while it contains much of utility, if properly handled, everything pertaining to the evils of secret societies seems to have been carefully ignored by the writers. The evil influence of the lodge-power pervades the public press as it does our halls of legislation and tribunals of justice, and discussion of it is forbidden, while it continues to drag men into moral slavery and down to perdition. Referring to the A. P. A., the Advance says: "Secret, oath-bound societies are abhorrent to the American idea." Granted; but why not admit that they are equally un-Christian? And why is the number of these "un-American" institutions constantly increasing, to the detriment of American homes, churches and government? How can these conditions be reconciled? Only by assuming that the "American idea" is rapidly becoming obsolete; and the press, led by the lodges, is largely responsible for this decadence.

THE WARREN COUNTY (ILL.) COURT-HOUSE.

The authorities of Warren county have in hand the erection of a new court-house at Monmouth, to cost about $100,000. A short time ago, the board of county supervisors requested the members of the county bar to arrange ceremonies for the laying of the corner-stone of the new edifice. The bar association, having no prescribed form for such an occasion, invited the Monmouth lodge of Freemasons to perform the ceremony in their usual manner. In pursuance of this invitation the Masons arranged to celebrate the event on February 22 (Washington's birthday), and secured ex-Congressman Owen Scott, Deputy Grand Master, to deliver the oration. They also invited Grand Master Goddard of Chicago to officiate.

The announcement of these arrangements at once stirred up a bitter feeling among those citizens who oppose secret societies, and on Jan. 14 Rev. Dr. Campbell, pastor of the Second United Presbyterian church of Monmouth, made a vigorous protest, from his pulpit, against the laying of the stone by Freemasons. His sermon created great excitement in the city. Five of the bar association, men of strong influence, with a member of the United Presbyterian church at their head, then requested the board of supervisors to rescind their concession to the Masons. This movement, during its discussion at a reconsideration meeting, led to another outbreak, disgruntled members of the association leaving the room in anger and disgust. The reconsideration ended in the appointment of a committee to formulate another plan of operation.

This committee, with a strange perversity, reinvited the Masons to participate in the ceremonies. In the prepared program, Dr. McMichael, President of Monmouth College, was named to pronounce the benediction. With an earnest protest he declined the honor. At this point the bar association appointed executive committees to perform the work required, as a non-sectarian but fraternal measure.

Dr. Campbell now came to the front again with a stirring protest, printed in a local paper, against the manner in which the bar association was playing into the hands of the Masons. Thereupon two members of the supervisors' building committee, who belonged to Dr. Campbell's denomination, called the other members of the committee together and rescinded their concession to the bar association. Turmoil and bitter discussion ensued, and lawsuits and other disagreeable measures were threatened.

"The United Presbyterian church, in point of membership," writes the correspondent of the Chicago Record, "is the largest denomination in the county, and as opposition to secret fraternities is one of their distinctive doctrinal principles they are arranging to defeat the Masons in the carrying out of their plans. They contend that the new court house belongs to the tax-payers of the county and that they alone should conduct the proposed ceremonies."

—The news from the Pennsylvania State Anti-secrecy Convention is encouraging. See the program and Bro. W. B. Stoddard's interesting letter on other pages.

—"Vick's Floral Guide" for 1894 contains descriptions that describe, not mislead; illustrations that instruct, without exaggeration. This year it comes to us in a golden dress, printed in eight different colors besides black; with colored plates of chrysanthemums, poppies and vegetables. On the front cover is an exquisite bunch of Vick's new white branching aster, and on the back is the new double anemone; the whole Guide filling 112 pages with many new novelties of value, as well as reproducing all the old leading varieties of flowers and vegetables. We advise those of our readers who intend to cultivate a garden this year to consult this excellent manual before commencing operations. Send 10 cents to James Vick's Sons, Rochester, N. Y., for Vick's Guide; it costs nothing, as senders can deduct the 10 cents from first order. It certainly will compensate them.

—Private advices received from the north country of the Himalayas give particulars of the tremendous earthquake which recently devastated that region, where the "Skoolbak," or Buddhist "God-incarnate" reigned supreme over the hearts of the Thibetans. The total loss of life by the sudden convulsion of nature is estimated at thousands, while four hundred were found mortally wounded, but still alive. The general distress was described as beyond exaggeration. Famine threatened the survivors, and the cry for relief was piteous. The greatest misfortune of the people, it is said, was the loss of their "God-incarnate," who mysteriously disappeared in the catastrophe; and it was feared that the knowledge of this event might rend asunder the entire fabric of their ancient faith in all those Eastern lands where Buddhism is the religion of the masses. The "holy monastery" in which he was secluded, with several other smaller Buddhist shrines was ruined, together with 850 houses occupied by Thibetan native soldiers and their families, and among the identified dead, at last advices, were seventy-four Llama priests. This disaster recalls the passage in Psalm 33: "The Lord bringeth the counsel of the heathen to nought: he maketh the devices of the people of none effect."

—Mr. Henry L. F. Gillespie, of Galesburgh, Ill., one of the principal contributors to the symposium in the Cynosure of last week relating to college fraternities, is meeting with an experience common among all anti-secrecy reformers. In a recent note he says: "I wrote to the President of Buchtel College to send me a catalogue of that school, with the leading members of the different 'chapters,' and also some of the non-fraters, marked. I received word, without signature, that if I would inform him of the purpose, that perhaps he would accommodate me. I at once answered that it was to send them a forthcoming issue of the Cynosure which would be devoted to the college frats question, and mailed the issue of Jan. 4 to the secretary of the school. I have received no answer; so I judge that he refuses my request. It shows the attitude of one college official towards this important question. He fears the truth. A member of the faculty in my school once made a similar effort, by preventing the publication of one of my anti-Greek (fraternity) essays in a local paper." Our correspondent will find this trait to cover up, "conceal and never reveal" permeating the whole secret society system throughout the world. It dreads the light.

Stephen Merritt related his experience. It was a wondrous story of how the Holy Spirit led him from the life of a wild, reckless youth in New York City, through the club-houses, the "Tombs" and the prayer meeting, on, and on, and up into the mount of victory and perfect peace. His life had been a checkered one, and after he had known much of the Spirit's power, he was induced to unite with the Masons' fraternity. Clouds very soon obscured his spiritual vision. He became an enthusiast and threw his whole soul into lodge work. Very soon the desire for tobacco and other appetites, from which he had been delivered, returned, and with their coming the Holy Spirit took his departure and he lost power with God and men. He could rave and storm and howl in the pulpit and on the platform, but nobody accepted Christ, or was regenerated. He became discouraged, and resolved to give up all Gospel work and devote himself wholly to secular pursuits. A devoted lady was the chosen instrument of the Spirit to lead him from his backsliding state into the light. He saw at once that he was "unequally yoked with unbelievers," and that he had been snared in an evil net spread in secret. He abstained from all active participation in lodge work, but not until recently did he break the last bond and come into the experience of entire emancipation from this body of death. There was intense interest throughout the entire audience, and at the close many were eager to obtain his printed testimony. Over 2,000 of these have been distributed during the convention, and will be carried to many distant homes, where they cannot fail of accomplishing great good.

J. P. STODDARD.

FROM THE EASTERN SECRETARY—THE PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

HEADQUARTERS, 457 N. Sixth St.,
PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Jan. 25, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I send herewith the program of our coming convention so far as I have been able to complete it. I hope to announce the lady to address us on the second evening, and also the music, more fully next week.

My visit to the W. C. T. U. rooms, here, today, was not altogether satisfactory. The President was not in. The lady in charge said they had plenty of speakers, and doubtless one could be secured, but not to represent the Philadelphia W. C. T. U. She had relatives, who were good, who belonged to the lodge, and she thought it could not be bad. She inquired why I opposed Masonry. I replied, somewhat at length, stating that a religion was taught with no Christ; ministers and saloon-keepers were their sworn brothers, etc. She said: "The churches do the same thing; you will have to bring stronger arguments than that if you convince me."

Mrs. H. M. Bratton, who conducts a mission in Camden, N. J., expressed a wish to attend the convention. She was to read a copy of the Cynosure, and let me know if she would speak. Strange that any women of good judgment should favor secret societies.

Many excellent letters have come since my last. Time forbids general mention.

Rev W. S. Schenck, of May's Landing, writes enthusiastically that he will (D. V.) be at the convention. He hopes to secure a hall for me to lecture in, in his town. Bro. S. is pastor of a Wesleyan Methodist church. Bro. J. C. Yoder will have an interesting experience to relate. Rev. F. M. Foster, New York, writes: "I will drop over if I can." Rev. F. Getty, U. P. pastor at West Philadelphia, writes: "I will announce and talk up the convention." Rev. T. T. Myers, Brethren pastor, said: "I hope to attend every session; will not only announce, but urge my people to attend." He will invite me to address his people. Rev. J. H. Leiper was about starting on a trip. He hopes to return for the convention. Bro. B. K. Hausman ordered a new supply of tracts. He takes twenty-five copies of the Cynosure each week for circulation.

Sabbath morning I walked four miles and spoke twice in the Free Methodist church. Several promised assistance in circulating programs of the convention.

On Tuesday I attended an all-day's convention at Rescue Mission, Camden, N. J. Spoke twice and gave tracts to those desiring them. Bro. G. Anderson, who conducts this mission, is a seceded Mason, and will speak at our convention. No little interest was manifssted. Thirteen dollars toward the expense of our gathering has been handed me; so God is putting it into the hearts of his children to provide for this need. In short, I see nothing but victory all the way along.

I suppose that the reason why the president called the convention for Monday evening is because he cannot reach us to give the response to the address of welcome sooner. It will be seen from the program that four sessions will be too short. Five will be little enough. I have taken the liberty to arrange a preparatory session.

We shall (D. V.) be prepared to give the president and Western delegates, arriving in the evening, a royal welcome.

The thinking people of Philadelphia are ready for reform. How many throughout the States of Pennsylvania and New Jersey will respond to the ringing call of our leaders remains to be seen. Let all friends and delegates expecting to attend, or desiring programs, write me at once. If thirty or more will come from Pittsburgh, a car will be furnished and a low rate given. What say you, friends in the West?

Address all letters to 457 N. Sixth St., Philadelphia.

W. B. STODDARD.

THE HOME.

"AND THEY SHALL NEVER PERISH."

(John 10: 28.)

"Never perish!"—words of mercy,
Coming from the lips of One
Who, though here a homeless wanderer,
Fills the high eternal throne.
Brightness of the Father's glory,
God and man in one combined;
Faithful Shepherd of the chosen,
Safe are those to Him assigned.

"Never perish!"—words of sweetness,
Dissipating every fear,
Filling all with joy and gladness
Who the Shepherd's voice can hear;
Bringing richest consolation
To the soul fatigued, oppressed,
Sweet refreshment to the fainting,
And, to weary spirits, rest.

"Never perish!"—words of power;
Satan now I can defy;
Safe my soul, beyond my keeping—
Hid with Christ in God on high.
Come what will, I'm safe forever;
'Tis the promise of my God,
Written in his Word unfailing,
Sealed with Jesus' precious blood.

"Never perish!"—words of glory.
Heaven is mine, and all is well,
O my soul! with rapture burning,
On the precious sentence dwell.
Think not of thy faults and failings,
Nor on thy deservings brood:
What thou art in Jesus ponder—
And the promise of thy God.

A TEMPERANCE STORY.

EX-GOV. ST. JOHN RELATES HOW FARMER BOGGS SUCCEEDED IN FINDING SALE FOR HIS WONDERFUL IMPORTED CORN.

Farmer Boggs planted some new seedcorn last spring, imported from a far distant land, and, as the result, gathered two thousand bushels from twenty acres, and he took a wagonload to the country town to exchange for the necessaries of life.

He had just entered the main business street, when a saloon-keeper hailed him and inquired the price of his corn.

"Forty cents a bushel," said Boggs.

"But I can get plenty of corn for thirty," replied the dealer in liquid goods.

"Not such corn as this," said the farmer. "This is a new kind—grown from imported seed. Nothing like it in the State."

"All right," said the saloon-keeper. "I will take it, as I have the best family horse in the country, and he shall have the very best corn in the market, so you may drive around to my barn and throw the corn in the crib, and while there, please tell John, my hired man, to give old Faithful a good feed, and have him hitched up by two o'clock, for I want to take my wife and two children out riding this afternoon."

Boggs unloaded the corn as directed—got his pay for it, made a few purchases, and left for home—while John promptly at two o'clock hitched old Faithful to the phæton. But as the saloon-keeper, his wife and two little daughters were getting into the vehicle, old Faithful's eyes flashed like fire; he reared upon his hind feet, snorted like a locomotive, and it was all John could do to hold him. At last, when all were fairly seated, John was told to let him go, and off went old Faithful down the street wholly unmanageable, until suddenly turning a corner, over went the phæton, smashed into splinters, and its occupants were sprawling into the street.

While the bruised and battered family was being picked up and cared for, a crowd of men succeeded in capturing Faithful. A veterinary surgeon was called, and as he took hold of the bit, old Faithful's breath struck him full in the face; he smiled and said: "There's nothing the matter with the horse, only he is drunk." Drunk on the new kind of corn.

The next day the farmer, ignorant of what had happened, took another load to town and stopped at the saloon, but the proprietor was not in. He then drove around to his residence, rang the bell, and the saloon-keeper, with a patch over one eye, his arm in a sling, nose mashed, hobbled to the door and was asked by Boggs if he didn't want to buy another load of corn?

Raising a crutch, he ejaculated: "Corn—corn! do I look like I needed any more of that kind of corn? Look at my wife there with a broken arm. See my darling little angels bruised beyond recognition. See my three hundred dollar phæton smashed into everlasting smithereens, and old Faithful so humiliated and ashamed that he can't look decent people in the face, and then dare to ask me if I want any more corn; get out of here you villainous old clodhopper, or I'll set my dog on you."

Boggs had two thousand bushels of that kind of corn. He had depended upon it to lift the mortgage of his farm, but now it seemed that all was lost.

He went to a lawyer and told him his story. The lawyer informed him that all he had to do was to take out a license. A petition was at once prepared and the farmer started out to get signers.

He went first to the saloon-keepers, supposing that they would sign without a word. But he was mistaken.

Instead of signing his petition, they with one accord declared that any man who would sell that kind of corn to be fed to a dumb brute was worse than a heathen.

Even the deacons refused to sign, declaring that they could not stand it, to see a colt humiliate and disgrace its mother by reeling through the public streets, or hear a cow bawl at the sight of her besotted calf; while a minister, with a look of indignation that was indiscribable, said in thunder tones, that if his party ever licensed the sale of that kind of corn he would never vote its ticket again, and then he quoted the Scripture about no drunkard entering the kingdom of God; and, as a final crusher, he asked Boggs what would become of all the poor dumb brutes, if we licensed the sale of that kind of corn? Then he wept.

Poor Boggs, discouraged, returned to the office, dropped the petition on the table, sank into a chair as he exclaimed: "Personal liberty is a myth."

The lawyer, moved by sympathy as lawyers always are, put on his best thinking-cap. In a moment his countenance beamed with joy; he slapped Boggs good-naturedly on the back and said: "Brighten up, old boy, I've got an idea. A capital idea, too, one that lets you out slick and clean, saves your farm, and, above all, preserves your personal liberty. You proceed at once to draw that corn to the distillery, have it made into whisky—and then circulate your petition for a license to sell the whisky, and they will all sign it, and thus the dumb brutes will be protected, personal liberty perpetuated, and besides all that, such a course will not hurt the party. You see it all depends upon whether the corn is sold in solid or liquid state."

HE CHOSE THIS PATH FOR THEE.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Ye who are weary with the world and its cares and follies; ye whose hearts are bowed with burdens; ye who look forward only to increased labors as the days go by, here is a little story for you. The old adage says: "Every dark cloud has a silver lining." Very true; it is equivalent to saying, "Weeping may endure through the night, but joy cometh in the morning." But here is my story:

Years ago a traveler was alone among the mountains of Switzerland. All day long he had wandered among the labyrinths of hills and valleys, until, as night drew on, he found that he was lost. He was in a deep glen. High around him towered the mountains, peak on peak, for thousands of feet, while, below, the darkness deepened. The shadows fell, black as the night can only be among those mighty Alpine hills. The wanderer's heart beat quickly with fear. It grew darker and darker. He dared not stir from the spot where he stood. Then suddenly, it became lighter; and, lifting his eyes, he saw the distant peaks illumined with the rays of the setting sun. They shone brighter in contrast with the darkness below, and the traveler's heart was thrilled, and he took new courage. He sounded a blast on his horn, and soon a party of hunters responded to his call, and he was safe in one of the many chalets which abound among the Alps of Switzerland.

Just so it is in life. We despair when we should hope; we allow lions to hedge up our pathway when a breath would sweep them away; we forget to look up when, if we did, we should see that, "though the valleys be dark, there is light on the hill."

Courage, fainting brother! There is light farther on. Though your work may seem thrown away and your strength spent for naught, He who sees the end from the beginning has placed each one in his own proper sphere, and our duty is to lean upon the arm of the higher Power, who said, through his prophet: "Underneath are the everlasting arms."

He chose this path for thee.
No feeble chance, no hard, relentless fate,
But love, his love hath placed thy footsteps here.
He knew the way was rough and desolate,
Knew how thy heart would often sink with fear,
Yet tenderly he whispered: Child, I see
This path is best for thee.

He chose this path for thee.
Though well he knew sharp thorns would tear thy feet,—
Knew how the brambles would obstruct the way—
Knew all the hidden dangers thou wouldst meet—
Knew how thy faith would falter day by day;
Yet still the whisper echoed: Yes, I see
This path is best for thee.

He chose this path for thee.
And well he knew that thou must tread alone
Its gloomy vales, and ford each flowing stream—
Knew how thy bleeding heart would sobbing, moan;
"Dear Lord, to wake and find it all a dream!"
Love scanned it all, yet still could say: I see
This path is best for thee.

He chose this path for thee.
How canst thou ask for more? This truth ye know—
That all along these strange, bewildering ways,
O'er rocky steeps, and where dark rivers flow,
His loving arms will bear thee "all the days."
A few steps more, dear friend, and thou shalt see
This path was best for thee.

Steamburgh, N. Y.

KINDLY ACTS THAT LEAVE THEIR IMPRESS.

"I had been standing on one of the crowded thoroughfares of the city some time," said a lady. "It seemed as if I never could get up enough courage to risk my life in trying to get to the other side, and yet it was necessary for me to do so. The attempt seemed more appalling because I lived in a quiet town, and was a stranger in the city. I must have had an appealing look in my face, for a young man coming toward me, looked up, and said: 'Shall I assist you to the other side, madam?' I walked over under his protection, thanking him from my heart, telling him that I was a stranger, and consequently timid, and he replied cheerily: 'That is the way my mother always feels when she comes from the country to visit me.' What a happy mother that young man's must be! I thought, as he bade me 'good afternoon' and hurriedly recrossed to join the crowd on the other side. He had such a pleasant face and such a kindly manner. I never shall forget his act of courtesy, and probably shall never meet him in this world again."

A lady was standing in a horse car not long since. She was not of sufficiently advanced age to be classed with "elderly women," but she was one of the weary, middle-aged ones, whose life was full of wear and tear. She was trying to hang on to the strap with a lame arm, when a young girl got up and said, in a sweet tone of voice: "Take my seat, please." The lady replied: "No, dear; I do not wish you to give up your seat." "But I am younger and stronger than you are, and insist upon it," she replied. The lady was so grateful that she could not half express the love there was in her heart for this stranger. It is quite probable that these two will never meet again, but the face of that young girl is one of the sweetest pictures that hang on memory's wall in that weary woman's heart. And such little courtesies as these make life easier and brighter.

There are a great many "little things" in life that bring happiness or cause misery. The thoughtlessness that will cause some loved one away from home to neglect to write to friends for an unusual length of time, is a cause of worry, and clouds the happiness of the family at home. A little matter which has been a grievance, and has passed, is often talked about and dwelt upon in the home, and thereby brings discomfort and irritation. A word of detriment spoken against some one of whom words of commendation have just been told, casts a shadow over the character of the subject, and oftentimes a life-long prejudice is formed in consequence.

Words with stings in them, thrown out to one and another, about this or that, coming or going out of the home, destroy the peace or joy of that circle. Words of commendation unspoken when some one has done the best to please us, are unjust, and rankle in the heart. Why is it that it is so much more natural with some of us to find fault than to encourage?

We, who are older, and who stop to look back over our lives, find so many places where we might have made the situation much pleasanter. We made too much of the things that mar and too little of the things that make. There is no danger of our being too kind and considerate of each other. "Love never faileth."

Prof. Drummond says: "I wonder why it is that we are not all kinder than we are? How much the world needs it! How easily it is done! How infallibly it is remembered! How superabundantly it pays itself back! For there is no debtor in the world so superbly honorable as love."—Susan Teall Perry in Evangelist.

CHILD-STORIES.

A little boy of three, who was remarkable for attentively listening to the conversation of older persons, heard a guest of the family quote the line:

"An honest man's the noblest work of God."

Coming forward, as if he was moved by duty to make an amendment of the poet's sentiment, he said:

"Sir, my mother's the noblest work of God too."

"How is that, my little fellow?"

"I learned a commandment that said, 'Honor thy father, and thy mother.'"

"How could you learn, when you cannot read?"

"The words were read to me, out of God's book. He made the honest man, and the honest woman, too. One is just as noble as t'other."

A little boy sat by his mother. He looked long in the fire, and was silent. Then as the deep thought passed away, his eye brightened, and he spoke:

"Mother, I will be rich."

"Why do you wish to be rich, my son?" And the child said, "Every one praises the rich. Every one asks after the rich. The stranger at our table yesterday, asked who was the richest man in the village.

"At school there is a boy who does not love to learn. He cannot well say his lessons. Sometimes he speaks evil words. But the other children do not blame him, for they say he is a wealthy boy."

Then the mother saw that her child was in danger of thinking that wealth might stand in the place of goodness, or be an excuse for indolence, or cause them to be held in honor who lead evil lives.

So she said, "What is it to be rich?" And he answered. "I do not know. Tell me what I must do to become rich, that all may ask after me and praise me."

The mother replied, To become rich, is to get money. For this you must wait until you are a man." Then the boy looked sorrowful and said, "Is there not some other way of being rich, that I may begin now?"

She answered, "The gain of money is not the only nor the true wealth. Fires may burn it, the floods drown it, the winds sweep it away. Moth and rust waste it, and the robber makes it his prey.

"Men are wearied with the toil of getting it, but they leave it behind at last. They die and carry nothing away. The soul of the richest prince goeth forth like that of the wayside beggar, without a garment.

"There is another kind of riches, which is not kept in the purse, but in the heart. Those who possess them are not always praised by men, but they have the praise of God."

Then said the boy, "May I begin to gather this kind of riches now, or must I wait till I grow up and am a man?" The mother laid her hand upon his little head, and said, "To day, if ye will hear his voice—for he hath promised, those who seek early shall find."

And the child said earnestly, "Teach me how I may become rich before God." Then she looked tenderly in his face, and said, "Kneel down, every night and morning, and ask that the love of the dear Saviour may dwell in your heart. Obey his Word, and strive all the days of your life to be good, and to do good to all. So, if you are poor in this world, you shall be rich in faith, and an heir of the kingdom of heaven."

A boy had taken great interest in hearing incidents read from the life of the Apostle John. That he had leaned on the breast of Jesus at supper, and was called the "beloved disciple," were to him themes of pleasant contemplation. To be loved by the Saviour, seemed to him an unspeakable privilege, a source of delightful happiness.

Being too young to read, some time elapsed ere he happened to listen to the passage, "Then all the disciples forsook him and fled."

"What, all the disciples?" said the child. Did he whom Jesus loved, go?"

Then bursting into a passion of tears, he said, "Oh! why did John go? How could John go away!"

Nor was he easily comforted for the fault of the character he so much admired, nor able to understand how the dear Saviour, who had so loved this friend and follower, could ever have been forsaken by him.

TEMPERANCE.

WHO'LL KILL KING ALCOHOL?

"Who'll kill King Alcohol?"
"I," says Prohibition,
"I'm in just the position,
And if I'm backed by the Constitution,
I'll kill King Alcohol."

"Who'll see him die?"
Says every temperance man, "I!
And we won't heave a sigh;
We'll be glad to see him die."

"Who'll catch his blood?"
"There would be such a flood;
Let it flow into the mud,
For it's not any good;
So we won't catch his blood."

"Who'll make his shroud?"
List to the voices loud:
"All over the land
We'll take a hand
To help make the shroud."

"Who'll toll the bell?"
"Oh! we won't toll a bell,
But we'll shout loud and clear,
So that every one can hear;
And t'will ring through the dell,
But we won't toll a bell."

"Who'll dig his grave?"
"I," says the drunkard,
"I've always been his slave;
I'll dig it long and deep;
May he forever sleep!
I'll be glad to dig his grave."

"Who'll be the chief mourner?"
"He has made so many cry,
Now he's about to die
There's not one far or near
That could shed a tear,
Or weep o'er his bier;
So there won't be a mourner."

EFFECTS OF ALCOHOLIC ABUSE UPON POSTERITY.

A man became a drunkard after middle life; children born to him before his degradation remained free from the vice of drunkenness, while those born afterward became drunkards.

Erasmus Darwin states that diseases inherited from drunkards descend to the third and fourth generations, until, finally, the family dies out.

Another observer says that of ninety-seven children of drunkards only fourteen remained free from some defect.

Still another maintains that fifty per cent of the idiots and imbeciles of cities are the children of drunkards.

The children of drinkers inherit the same or a greater pre-disposition to nervous disorders than those of nervous or really insane parents. They suffer most frequently in infancy from convulsions and epileptiform diseases.

Districts known as "drinkers' districts" in Europe furnish far fewer good recruits for military service.

A law was passed in Sweden against drunkenness, i. e., making it a punishable offence, and since then the number of persons unfit for military service on account of undersize and general weakness has grown much less.

A distinguished specialist in children's diseases observed ten families of drinkers and of temperate parents for a period of twelve years. He records his observation as follows:

The ten drinking families produced in those twelve years fifty-seven children. Of these, twenty-five died in the first week of life, of weakness, of convulsive attacks, or of edema of brain and membranes. Six of the children were idiots; five were stunted in size, and were of real dwarfish growth; five, when older, became epileptics; one, a boy, had grave chorea, ending in idiocy; five had inherited diseases and deformities, such as chronic hydrocephalus, harelip and club foot; two of the epileptics mentioned became, by inheritance, drinkers. Only ten, therefore, of all these fifty-seven, or 17.5 per cent, showed during youth normal disposition and development of body and mind.

The ten temperate families produced in twelve years sixty-one children. Of these, five died in the first weeks, of weakness; four, in later years of childhood, had curable nervous affection; two only showed inherited nervous defects. The remaining fifty, or fully 8.19 per cent, were normal in every way, developing well in body and mind.

My friend, Dr. Vandenburg, has kindly furnished me with a list of forty-four patients treated by him for alcoholism. On examining the notes carefully I find that twenty-five of them had ancestors, or at any rate relatives, who drank. Of ten of them there was no previous history obtainable; these, very likely, ought to be added to twenty-five, as it appeared from certain signs that they merely did not wish to expose their family histories.

It is a curious but very general fact that there exists a sort of instinctive tendency in the members of a family to hide from others as well as from themselves anything that would tell of the defect by a faulty nervous inheritance—I mean an inheritance of defects in the central nervous system. Men do not like to acknowledge the controling influence of such a fate, and they often instinctively take pains to refer diseases that are unmistakably inherited to very ordinary, accidental, and always different causes. To try to obtain information in such matters from family members is too frequently a fruitless undertaking. They will often throw impediments in one's way, even leading one into wrong paths; and to make a proper diagnosis and prognosis in nervous diseases one must try to learn not the history of his patient, but also the diseases that are prominent in his family.

But to return to my Vandenburg statistics; four mothers and sisters were tuberculous; one has a father who is very nervous and smokes incessantly; one has an asthmatic grandfather. Only three have a family record that seem free from all defects. Eleven of them have shown tuberculosis or some other lung difficulty in their families; one had insanity on the mother's side, and of one the father's sister was insane; and one had insanity in two aunts on the father's side. There was insanity in the father of one, induced by drink; and in one instance the paternal grandfather drank heavily, the father moderately. In one case the paternal grandfather drank hard and died of apoplexy, the great grandmother was tuberculous, and the mother paralytic. In four instances the grandfather drank heavily, though the fathers were free from the vice.—Dr. A. E. Schmid, in the Medical News

An official petition, signed by the general officers of each State W. C. T. U., is soon to be forwarded to Congress protesting against the increase of the federal tax upon whisky.

There is but one drunken woman to every thousand men, and one criminal woman to twelve criminal men. And yet, they tell us that woman isn't to be trusted with the ballot.—Danville News.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. The covenant with Abraham renewed.—vs. 1, 2. Thirteen years had elapsed since God's last appearance to Abraham. Meanwhile he had to live the ordinary life of faith without any extraordinary helps beyond what can be enjoyed by every Christian. It is natural to think that such a life was easier for these anciont worthies than for ourselves; that they did not meet with the obstacles and hindrances we meet with, when the probability is that they had to fight just as hard against sin, and found just as much to obstruct their way to heaven as we do. Abraham had no Bible, for not a single page of it had then been written. Of all those wonderful promises and testimonies that are the daily manna of the Christian to-day, he knew nothing. Even more than we he had to walk by faith and not by sight. "I am the the Almighty God." Says Matthew Henry: "Our old English translation reads it here very significantly, I am God, all-sufficient. Note. (1) The God with whom we have to do is a God that is enough; enough in himself, having everything and needing nothing. (2) And enough for us if we be in covenant with him. We have all in him." The command, "Walk before me and be thou perfect," is neither arbitrary nor impossible. It is in accordance with the law of consistency that a perfect God should require perfect service. But we often err in putting a wrong interpretation on the word. The margin reads, upright, or sincere. It is not a command to be infallible. We know that Abraham made mistakes, that he even committed one or two grave errors; but he was yet a perfect man in the sense in which the Psalmist uses the expression, Ps. 37: 37. His motives were pure. He had the will to obey God completely. He was single-minded, not trying to serve God and the world at the same time. Again the Lord renews his covenant with Abraham, and repeats the promise, "I will multiply thee exceedingly." Abraham was ninety-nine, and yet the promise was unfulfilled. The richest and most precious blessings are the ones that seem longest delayed. Yet men do not count it a hardship to lose the best years of life, waiting for a favoring tide in fortune. Why should we not be at least as willing to wait on God as the worldly man to drudge and toil through the larger part of his existence with the possibility—impossible to those who trust in God—of being disappointed at last?

2. Abraham's name changed.—vs. 3–6. Abraham fell on his face,—prostrated himself in the lowliest reverence before God—and then "God talked with him." We have the closest and sweetest communion with God when we are most thoroughly emptied of self. "Behold my covenant is with thee." God says this to every believer. The humblest Christian may feel that it is an individual, personal thing—as much so as if he stood alone in the universe. "Neither shall thy name be called Abram." So the Christian, we are told in Rev. 2: 17, receives a new name, denoting that all his old associations are changed, that he has come into new relations as an heir of God and joint heir with Christ. "A father of many nations have I made thee." In the broadest and grandest sense this refers to his spiritual seed. It was a small thing for Abraham to be the progenitor by natural generation of all the nations and tribes which claim descent from him, beside the honor of being the "father of the faithful,"—that innumerable multitude who have trod the same way of trust in God, and been "blessed in faithful Abraham." "And I will establish my covenant"—make it firm and unchangeable, in opposition to human covenants which time may disannul, or some legal technicality render mere waste-paper. "To thy seed after thee." Like all God's promises, this is conditional on obedience. It is a great blessing to have pious parents, but if the children refuse to walk in their footsteps, they forfeit their birthright like Esau. So the Jews were rooted out of their own land and dispersed over the world, because while they boasted that Abraham was their father, they had none of Abraham's spirit, and thus proved themselves not to be his true children. It was an "everlasting covenant" in this sense, that God has never changed. To all eternity he will not fail to keep his part of the covenant, however man may transgress, or even trample on its gracious provisions.

3. The charge to keep God's covenant.—vs. 8, 9. "For an everlasting possession." This is one of many passages which seem to favor a restoration of the Jews to their own land. "Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore;" in view of the great blessings promised. We should more frequently, as Christians, review the richness of "our inheritance in Christ Jesus," both for this world and the next, that our flagging energies may be stimulated, and our souls encouraged to press on in spite of difficulties in that highway of holiness which leads at last to the heavenly Canaan.

LITERATURE.

THE ERRORS OF EVOLUTION. Part I. Scientific Star-Building: The Nebular Theory Examined. By Robert Patterson, San Francisco, Cal. Part II. Geological Evolution: An Examination of its Pedigree, Pretensions, and Predictions. By Robert Patterson. Part III. The Origin of Life: Was Man Evolved from Granite? By Robert Patterson. Part IV. Darwinism: The Origin of Species. By Robert Patterson. Four volumes in paper, pp. 271. Published, separately, by H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill, Boston, Mass. Prices respectively 15, 15, 10, and 15 cents; or bound together in one neat volume, $1.00.

These four little treatises are comprised in "The Anti-Infidel Library," edited and published by Mr. Hastings, a collection of facts and figures, derived from the labors of intelligent Christians and Bible students; the whole forming a phalanx of truth against which no human sophistries can prevail; so reasonable in price that all may read; so plain in language that all who read may understand, and so strong in argument and illustration as to carry conviction to those whose minds are not sodden with unholy prejudices.

"The theory of evolution," writes the editor of this important series, "has been so popularized in the name of science that many who know little about science accept it, and risk their soul's salvation on the word of the lecturer, or professor, or newspaper advocating it. This is merely superstition. It is scientfic superstition, not one whit more respectable than religious superstition, And in this case it is dangerous; for . . . . the theory of evolution is not scientific. It is not founded on facts. Its premises do not warrant the conclusions drawn from them. If the tree is to be judged by its fruits, it is poisonous. . . . . Taking the evolutionists on their own grounds—scientific foundation facts—I propose to show that the theory is unfounded, absurd and degrading. I take the theory from its acknowledged prophets, and adduce my conflicting facts from scientists of acknowledged reputation. . . . . The theory of evolution is a cosmogony or scheme of world-building, of world-wide comprehensiveness. It begins with the stars, and descends to the worms; nor does it exclude man and his affairs. Indeed it proposes to include all human affairs—personal, social, political, and religious—in its domain. It is monarch of all it surveys, dethroning alike Moses and Mohammed, Kaiser and Calvin, Pontiff and President, by the supreme law of the 'survival of the fittest' applied unflinchingly alike to mammoths and ministers, and carried out by the most diverse agencies from the glacial period to the age of nitro-glycerine. . . . . In this work the attempt is made to demonstrate the theory of evolution to be unscientific, irrational and profane; and, in conclusion, Christianity is proved to be a solidly-established inductive science, capable of demonstration by experiment."

Of Rev. Dr. Patterson it may be said that few men have been more faithful in searching for the truth in Bible study, more clear in dissecting error, or more just in reaching conclusions. These little books bear evidence of his ability to cope successfully with the most subtle as well as the most glaring fallacies.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The leading article in the February number of Worthington's Magazine is Peasant Life in Picardy, by Helen Evertson Smith, who has written of her sojourn in one of the quaintest of little fishing hamlets on the coast of Northern France. New phases of simple, honest, laborious, but cheerful life are here portrayed. The article is lavishly illustrated. The second illustrated paper gives the conclusion of that most remarkable story—Gen. Rose's own account of the digging of the famous Libby Prison tunnel, through which more than one hundred men escaped. Gen. Rose's account is full, circumstantial, entirely reliable, and one of permanent historic interest. The short stories are excellent, and the poems fine. Two interesting papers, of a scientific nature, though written in popular style, are Germs and the Germ Theory of Disease, by D. Rollins Brown, M. D., and the Emotions in the Lower Animals, by Prof. James Weir, Jr., M. D. Some Familiar Quotations show how much the meaning or the form of a phrase may be altered through persistent mis-quotation. The department articles are well up to the standard. By many readers these articles are first sought for, and read with an appreciation that shows itself in many letters of praise and encouragement. In Our Young People the serial story, Giant's Bracket, by Catherine Lee Bates, is attracting the attention of young readers. It is a bright and wholesome story. The magazine, in its entirety, makes a remarkably good showing, ranking high among its numerous competitors. Published at Hartford, Conn. Price, 25 cents.

The January number of the Converted Catholic, edited and published by Rev. James O'Connor (a seceding priest), at 142 West 21st St., New York City, begins the eleventh volume of this valuable evangelizer in an enlarged form, new type and a fine portrait of its editor and proprietor. It numbers among its contributors, from month to month, Rev. Geo. C. Needham, Chaplain McCabe, Mrs. Needham, ex-"father" Connelan, Rev. Dr. Kerr, Mrs. J. Fowler Willing, Gen. T. M. Harris (author of "The Assassination of Lincoln"), and other powerful authors. The editor is himself a most talented writer on the errors of Romanism. Not the least interesting of the regular contents of this magazine are the reports of Christian work performed at Christ Mission in New York, founded and conducted by "Father O'Connor" in the interest of Christ's kingdom, which the Lord has indeed richly blessed. The Christian spirit is profoundly manifest in both the magazine and the mission, and both deserve the fullest encouragement. Price, 10 cents monthly, or one dollar a year.

PAMPHLET.

From the author, Rev. William Dallmann, editor of the Lutheran Witness at Baltimore, Md., a neatly printed booklet of 56 pages, entitled, "The Dance," comes to our table. The arguments against this form of amusement, and the dangers which its indulgence creates, may not be new, but the plain, nervous style in which they are set forth, and the many valuable testimonies which it contains, invest it with an interest that cannot be otherwise than beneficial in the social circle. It deserves the widest circulation. Published by the Lutheran Publication Society of Baltimore.

NOTES.

The Century Co., 33 East 17th St., New York, have just issued "Pudd'nhead Wilson's Calendar for 1894," containing humorous extracts from Mark Twain's latest story, "Pudd'nhead Wilson," now appearing in The Century. They offer to send a copy of the calendar free to any one who will enclose them a stamp to pay postage.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

OUR COLORED BRETHREN.

—The ad interim committees of the Northern and Southern assemblies of the Presbyterian church of the United States have decided by an unanimous vote upon co-operation in the matter of colored evangelization. Being clothed with plenipotentiary authority and representing the entire church in the States their action pledges the Presbyterian funds and energy to evangelistic work in the Negro race.

—According to the Charleston (S. C,) News and Courier, there are 25,530 Negro schools now in the South; 2,250,000 Negroes have learned to read, and most of them to write. In the colored schools are 238,000 pupils and 20,000 Negro teachers. There are 150 schools for advanced education, and several colleges administered by Negro presidents and faculties.

—There are twenty Hawaiian students in Yale College. Jan. 17th they celebrated the first anniversary of the revolution.

—Perhaps the most famous distributor of Bibles in the world was Deacon William Brown, of New Hampshire. He began the work in 1849, and kept it up until his death last year at the age of 76. During that time no less than 120,000 copies of the Scriptures were given out by him, and in two years preceding his death he canvassed 239 towns and visited over 80,000 families.

—The college secretary of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. publishes a valuable table of statistics relating to the religious condition of the colleges of North America for the college year 1892–93, and not including young women or students in professional schools. It appears that 147 colleges have the English Bible in their curriculum, of which 68 are in the Western States and 31 in the South. Number of associations, 441; active members, 20,856; young men, 70,419; Christians, 38,327; non-Christians, 32,092; conversions, 2,850; studying for ministry, 4,802: studying for foreign missions, 1,115.

Allyn's Ritual of Freemasonry by Avery Allyn contains the fully Illustrated Ritual of the Blue Lodge, Chapter Council and Commandery, 11 of the Scotch Rite Degrees, Several Masonic side degrees and what is termed a Key to the Phi Beta Kappa, the Orange and Odd-fellows Societies. Price in cloth $5.00.

Duncan's Masonic Ritual and Monitor. Profusely illustrated with explanatory engravings, and containing the ritual and work of the order for the seven degrees, including the Royal Arch. Though extensively used as an Instruction Book and one of the best in the market it is not as accurate as "Freemasonry Illustrated," the first book on catalogue. Price in cloth, $2 50.

Richardson's Monitor of Freemasonry. Containing the ceremonies of Lodges, Chapters, Encampments, etc. Illustrated. Although extensively used in conferring the higher degrees, it is not only very incomplete but inaccurate especially as regards the first seven degrees, and as to the higher degrees it gives but a description and general idea of the degrees rather than the full ritual. Price in cloth, $1.25; Paper covers, 75c.

Look to the East. A Ritual of the first three Masonic Degrees by Ralph Lester. Price in cloth $2.00. Notwithstanding the high price this book is very inferior in every way to Freemasonry Illustrated or The Handbook of Freemasonry at a quarter the price.

The Master's Carpet, or Masonry and Baal Worship Identical, explains the true source and meaning of every ceremony and symbol of the lodge. Bound in fine cloth, 420 pages, 75 cents.

Masonic Oaths Null and Void: OR FREEMASONRY SELF-CONVICTED. This is a book for the times. The design of the author is to refute the arguments of those who claim that the oaths of Freemasonry are binding upon those who take them. 207 pages. Postpaid, 40 cents each.

Judge Whitney's Defense before THE GRAND LODGE OF ILLINOIS. Judge Daniel H. Whitney was Master of the lodge when S. H. Keith, a member of his lodge, murdered Ellen Slade. Judge Whitney, by attempting to bring Keith to justice, brought on himself the vengeance of the lodge, but he boldly replied to the charges against him, and afterwards renounced Masonry. 15 cents each.

General Washington Opposed to SECRET SOCIETIES. This is a re-publication of Governor Joseph Ritner's "Vindication of General Washington from the Stigma of Adherence to Secret Societies." communicated to the House of Representatives of Pennsylvania, March 8, 1837, at their special request. To this is added the fact that three high Masons were the only persons who opposed a vote of thanks to Washington on his retirement to private life—undoubtedly because they considered him a seceding Freemason. 10cts each.

Morgan's Exposition, Abduction AND MURDER, AND OATHS OF 33 DEGREES. Composed of "Freemasonry Exposed," by Capt. Wm. Morgan;" "History of the Abduction and Murder of Morgan;" "Valance's Confession of the Murder of Capt. Wm. Morgan;" "Bernard's Reminiscences of Morgan Times," and "Oaths and Penalties of 33 Degrees." 300 pages; cloth, $1.00.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' said 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer' '"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

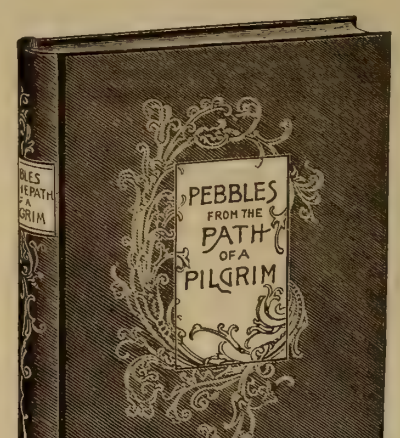
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the seeret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books— with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches with an earnestness born of conviction.

Talks to Sunday School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematised. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Teloscope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

FARM NOTES.

Ground bone makes a lasting and satisfactory fertilizer.

The most nutritive part of the wheat goes with the bran.

Do not let any weeds go to seed around your house and barn.

An even temperature of fifty degrees is a good one for the winter hen-house.

Do not be in too big a hurry to store the corn. Let it be well cured before cribbing.

Better do a little and do it well, rather than undertake to do too much and fail to do anything well.

When trimming shrubs and bushes cut out the wood; leave the new for next season's bloom and fruitage.

Never permit a piece of land lie idle because it is rough. Stock it with sheep and they will, at least, pay the interest and taxes.

Keep the work teams in good condition. There is no advantage in letting them run down now, and being obliged to feed up later on.

A box of coal ashes in the hen-yard gives the hens lots of employment. They find a lot of grit among it, and have the fine sport wallowing in the dust. But never give them wood ashes.

When planting trees, have a good supply of surface soil ready, and sift and pack this in and about the roots. Soil that contains some available plant food is necessary to give it a proper start in life.

The Hessian fly is so-called because it was supposed to have been brought from Germany during the Revolutionary war in wheat imported for the use of the Hessian mercenaries in the British army. It has traveled west at the rate of fifteen or twenty miles a year.

FIVE FAMOUS ETCHINGS.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem river at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of the falling waters and spray.

No. 3.—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4.—"999 and the DeWitt Clinton." The Famous Empire State Express Engine "999," which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "DeWitt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railroad science in the past fifty years.

No. 5.—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark St., Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address, postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to George H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT of the Holy Ghost,

BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Triunity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by perusing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FOREIGN.

Sir Samuel White Baker, the African explorer, died December 30, 1893, at Newton Abbott, Devonshire, England, aged seventy-two years. In 1861, he commenced, at his own cost, an enterprise for the discovery of the Nile sources. For many years he explored the regions of Abyssinia, whence comes the Blue Nile. On March 14, 1864, he discovered a great fresh-water lake, which he named the Albert Nyanza. In September, 1869, he undertook the command of an expedition to Central Africa under the auspices of the Khedive. Sir Samuel was a prolific writer, many of his works treating of his explorations.

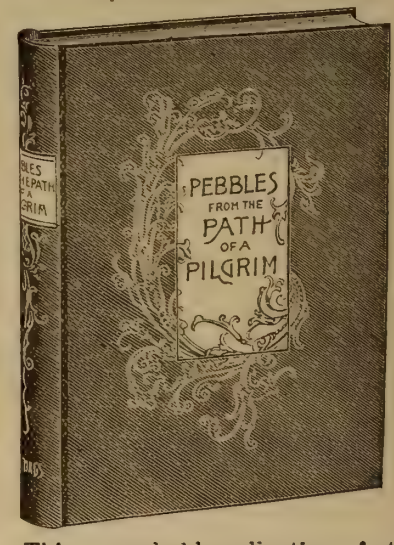
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL ANTI-SECRECY MEETING.

To the Friends of the Cause of Anti-secrecy in Pennsylvania:—You are requested to assemble in the First United Presbyterian church, corner of Broad and Lombard streets, in the city of Philadelphia, on Monday and Tuesday, February 26 and 27, to hear reports and discuss matters that pertain to the Master's cause as they stand related to the National Christian Association and its work.

The opening session will be on Monday, February 26, at 7:30 P. M.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard, Field Secretary, will arrange and report program, with the advice of friends in Philadelphia.

Perils are imminent—the times auspicious. Let prayer be made for the presence and blessing of the Master of assemblies. Let there be a full rally of godly, praying people, male and female. Wise men will be glad to confer and know what "Israel ought to do" to turn back the tide of this flood which the dragon has sent out to destroy the church and the nation.

Reformers should be aroused!

Statesmen should be warned!

Victims should be saved from this all-desolating flood!

Let this convention inaugurate a new era of activity, zeal and success.

S. COLLINS, Pres.
J. S. T. MILLIGAN, Cor. Sec'y.
Beaver, Pa., Jan. 12, 1894.

The Pennsylvania State Anti-secrecy Convention, the call and program of which are respectively printed on this and the ninth pages of to-day's issue, receives new interest from the letter of Bro. W. B. Stoddard, on page five. He writes encouragingly, and feelingly appeals to our friends to attend as numerously as possible, and to urge the attendance of others. The program, corrected to date, is highly attractive, and there is good promise (D. V.) of a large and successful gathering. Those who expect to attend should write at once to Bro. Stoddard, to secure entertainment.

Twenty-six Roman Catholic parishes in Milwaukee, Wis., have become interested in the new secret order of the "Columbian League," whose ostensible object is "to sustain the rights which all Americans enjoy in common under the Constitution and in accordance with the spirit of our free institutions." Its real purpose, however, openly expressed by the Roman Catholic press, is to antagonize the influence of the anti-Catholic A. P. A. in politics.

The Midwinter California Fair, an off-shoot of the great Columbian Exposition in Chicago, was opened at San Francisco on Sunday, Jan. 29, with appropriate formalities. Compared with its prototype, it is a mere pigmy, but still it promises to be in many respects a creditable and successful exhibition. It will receive a large local patronage, and a gratifying influx of visitors from all along the Pacific coast. Sabbath observance will not be one of its features.

On Thursday of last week, after combining with it the proposed income-tax law, the lower house of Congress passed the amended Wilson tariff bill, by a vote of 204 to 140. It is now before the Senate for amendment, adoption, or rejection. It has been the cause of a tedious and wordy discussion, and in its present form represents the sentiments of the conservative free-traders. Of course it meets with severe criticisms from the advocates of a high tariff, who see in it danger to our national commerce. We shall see.

The Lutheraner, the organ of the Missouri Synod of German Lutherans, earnestly warns its readers against uniting with the American Protective Association, because, as it says, "no Christian can be a member of this organization without committing a great sin." This being the case, it is also a great sin to join the Masons, Odd-fellows, Jesuits, Knights of Pythias, Clan-na-Gael, United Hibernians, Mollie Maguires, or any other Christless, oath-bound and murderous secret society. This has been the mission of the Cynosure for many years—to teach the sinfulness of belonging to and sustaining these fraternities; and we are glad to know that we are heartily endorsed by the German Lutherans.

The rumor that Premier Gladstone is likely to retire from public life at an early day cannot but have a depressing effect upon the advocates of Home Rule for Ireland, since the "grand old man" has been its greatest English promoter. Irishmen evidently feel that his retirement would be an irretrievable loss to their cause; and if the signs of the times are any indication of its effect, it is found in a new Irish league—the "Ults"—recently formed in Chicago, intended to embrace every Irishman in the United States, the object of which is to rise en masse and demand Ireland for the Irish, or by force and arms go and take it. Such is the very plain statement of the Western Catholic News of February 3.

The progress of the trial of Dan Coughlin for participation in the murder of Dr. P. H. Cronin, during the past week, resulted in some striking testimony on the part of the defense. Largely the evidence introduced in Coughlin's behalf was intended to prove alibis for himself and O'Sullivan on that eventful occasion. Expert surgical testimony was presented to show that the wounds on Dr. Cronin's head did not necessarily cause his death. The evidence in this direction was more or less frivolous, and its effect upon the jury can hardly convince them that the doctor died from "kidney disease," or "strangulation," as was suggested. Police Inspector Schaack, who was called by the defense, gave valuable testimony for the prosecution. Moreland, the hostler, who hitched the celebrated white horse for Coughlin's friend on the night of the murder, has been found. Altogether the guilt of the prisoner is being gradually but strongly proven.

About a month ago the press gave publicity to a marked expression of the pope favoring universal peace between nations, significantly remarking, "Peace will give free scope to this apostolate, which holds its commission from on high." So that his utterance very clearly demonstrated his motive—the extension of papal power throughout the world. War may be—nay is—a great evil, but to give the papacy universal political power would certainly be detrimental to civil and religious freedom. Now comes news of a movement strongly agitated throughout Europe, except by France (who is afraid of Germany), for a disarmament of all those nations on the continent which for years past have been increasing and maintaining immense standing armies. It is evidently the first step towards the advancement of the papal policy, and will be watched with interest by all the world. Great Britain, it is intimated, has manifested but little enthusiasm in the movement. The maintenance of immense standing armies throughout Europe is a grievous burden upon the people from whom their support is derived, and it would doubtless be a great relief if their national defenders could with safety be reduced to a universal peace footing.

At Topeka, Kan., this week, is being held the national meeting of the Farmers' Alliance, at which delegates from nearly every State and Territory are in attendance. The principal discussion will be over the adoption of the new Constitution of the Alliance, which is strongly advocated by U. L. Upson and others from the East. Mr. Upson wants the Alliance to work on a broader plan, and instead of being so loose in its ritualistic work have an initiatory ceremony more like the Masons. He wants it arranged so that when a man is initiated into the Alliance he will know that he belongs to something. Instead of each local Alliance being allowed to make its own constitution, he would have them governed by the State, and the State by the national constitution, just as the Odd-fellows, with one grand master at the head of the order. H. L. Loucks, of Huron, S. D., president of the national organization, in explaining the falling off of membership in the Alliance and the lack of interest, said: "A political party has come into existence whose principles are identical with ours, and a great many, thinking that relief could be secured only through legislation, went into the People's party and neglected our organization." And yet there are intelligent people who tell us that the People's party is not a political institution! The discussion, it is understood, will be a warm one.

SHALL THE NATION ACKNOWLEDGE CHRIST?

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

In the December number (1893) of Our Day, Rev. W. C. Wood, of Boston, contributes an article on "God in the Constitution." He maintains that to acknowledge God in the Constitution of the United States would be eminently proper, but it would be dangerous to recognize Christ as King. It were sufficient to reply that "the nation that hath not the Son, hath not the Father." "Without me ye can do nothing."

Rabinowitz, the Russian Jew, a lawyer, scholar, philanthropist, and close student of the Old Testament Scriptures, was converted ten years ago. Prof. Delitzsch thinks his the most remarkable conversion since that of Saul of Tarsus. He said: "Our Jewish bankers, with their millions of gold, can do nothing for us; our scholars and statesmen, with all their wisdom, can do nothing for us; our colonization societies, with all their influence and capital, can do nothing for us; our only hope is in our brother Jesus, whom we crucified, and whom God raised up and set at his own right hand." This was written on the Mount of Olives, respecting the restoration of the Jewish nation. And what is true of that nation is also true of every nation.

1. All moral ordinances are subject to Christ. The Sabbath is a moral ordinance, having its necessity in our nature and its authority in God's Word. "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." But the Sabbath is under law to Christ. "The Son of Man is Lord also of the Sabbath-day."

The family is a divine institution. Marriage is an ordinance of God. It is the divine method of restraining vice, fostering virtue and multiplying the buman race. But the family is under law to Christ. "They twain shall be one flesh," said Jesus.

The state is a divine ordinance. It has its necessity in the very constitution of our nature and its authority in God's Word, "the powers that be are ordained of God." The state is also subject to Christ. "By me kings reign and princes decree justice; by me princes rule, and nobles, even all the judges of the earth."

The ten commandments were placed in the ark, under the mercy-seat. Christ is our mercy-seat or "propitiation." The ten commandments are in his hand as the Administrator of the moral law. They are our rule of life in the hands of the Mediator. We are under this law to Christ. But the state is the keeper of both tables of the law. This links the state with the throne of Immanuel.

2. The nation as a moral person is subject to Christ. The nation is a moral being, having reason, will and conscience. It has a character for good or evil, and is capable of rights and obligations. It has a unity and continuity running through the generations. It contracts debts and may not repudiate. It commits crimes for which succeeding generations suffer. "National righteousness," "national faith," "national virtue," are not mere figures of speech. The Bible speaks of "ungodly nation," "wicked nation," "hypocritical nation," "holy nation," "godly nation," "righteous nation." Milton said: "A nation ought to be one huge Christian personage, one mighty growth and stature of an honest man." A nation sins, confesses, and is forgiven. Nineveh is an example.

In 1863, the Senate of the United States requested President Lincoln to appoint a day for national confession of sin, "encouraged," as they expressed it, "by the assurances of his Word to seek him for succor according to the appointed way, through Jesus Christ." If the nation must confess sin, and be forgiven "through Jesus Christ," then she must give thanks through his name. And, hence, the Thanksgiving proclamations of our Governors and Presidents should recognize Christ as King of nations. A nation keeps the Sabbath by stopping the whole machinery of government, and prohibiting the railroads to run trains, the press to issue Sunday papers, and the United States mail service to continue on the Lord's day. A nation that confesses its sins through Jesus Christ, gives thanks in his name, and observes the Christian Sabbath, is a Christian nation. The organic people is a Christian personality.

In 1824 the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania declared that "Christianity—general Christianity is and always has been a part of the common law of Pennsylvania; not Christianity founded on particular tenets, nor an established church with tithes and spiritual courts, but Christianity with liberty of conscience to all men." In February, 1892, the Supreme Court of the United States said: "This is a Christian nation." This nation is under as much obligation to recognize the authority and law of Christ as King in its sphere, as the church, in her corporate capacity, is to acknowledge him as her Head in her sphere. The nation that will not bow to Christ shall perish. "Honor the King."

3. Christ has been appointed King of nations. 1. His royal titles proclaim this. "The Governor among the nations," "Prince of the kings of the earth," "King of kings, and Lord of lords." The fact lies behind each title that he has been appointed King of nations. 2. Nations are called upon to obey him. "Be wise, oh, ye kings; be instructed, ye judges: serve the Lord; kiss the Son." This can mean nothing less than an official recognition of his authority and a loyal acceptance of his law. 3. He punishes rebellious nations. "The burden of Egypt," "the burden of Babylon," "the burden of Nineveh," are his mediatorial judgments upon rebellious nations. Amos pronounces sentence against the nations rejecting him. "For three transgressions of Damascus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they threshed Gilead with threshing instruments of iron." "For three transgressions of Gaza, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they carried the whole of captivity captive, to deliver them to Moab." "For three transgressions of Tyrus, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they remembered not the brotherly covenant." "For three transgressions of Edom, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because he pursued his brother." "For three transgressions of Ammon, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they ripped up the women with child." "For three transgressions of Moab, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they burned the bones of the kings of Edom to lime." "For three transgressions of Israel, and for four, I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they keep not my law." "The wrath of the Lamb" caused Rome Pagan to fall. And all the nations that forget to honor him must go down. 4. He prospers the nations that honor him. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord." To accept Mr. Wood's proposition that the nation honor God, but reject Christ, would be to forfeit the blessings of heaven, and invoke the outpouring of the vials of his wrath upon us. God forbid that this nation should thus dig her own grave, make her own coffin, and erect her own gallows. We hope better things of our "land."

Boston, Mass.

INTEMPERANCE.

BY REV. P. B. WILLIAMS.

A most lamentable state of affairs in our fair land is the cause for general alarm over the fearful increase and results of the rum traffic and drinking usages; and yet the masses, even of Christian people, are unalarmed.

It despoils our nation annually of $1,483,491,000. It slays annually 100,000, who, if laid out side by side as closely as possible, would cover thirteen acres of ground; and it actually requires seventy-five acres to bury their bloated bodies in each year. This fearful work of death mocks all the ravages of war, famine, pestilence and shipwreck.

The Johnstown disaster was a mere pigmy beside this giant evil, and yet it aroused the whole nation and even the civilized world.

Why are we not aroused by this unmitigated curse? If the yellow fever visits a city or community, and carries off twenty or thirty persons a day, the sympathies of a nation are at once aroused. If fifty or a bundred human beings are engulfed in the ocean by shipwreck, the whole country groans; while this great evil of intemperance is over-spreading all our land and blighting half its glory.

Only think! One hundred thousand of our citizens are annually poisoned, polluted, and blasted, by this withering curse, and fitted only for "outer darkness," and exclusion from God. In the face of all this evil, we have many professed Christians who will advocate the traffic as a source of revenue to the state. It is revenue with a vengeance!

At Garfield, Whitman County, Washington, a man under the influence of liquor stabbed and killed a peaceable citizen. It has already cost the county sixty-five thousand dollars, and they are not more than half through with the case. This is but one instance, thousands of which might be related.

Not less than seven millions are walking along the road of a moderate drinker, to drunkenness and hell. And this great multitude are gradually covering a much greater number of their associates and friends with shame, weeping and woe. Ah, who can say that he has had no friend or relative ruined by this plague? No arithmetic can compute the increasing horrors of the rum-curse in our land. What figures can compute to you the taxes paid, the money wasted, the sins committed, the families beggared, the characters ruined and bodies destroyed, in the annual process of making, murdering and burying one hundred thousand drunken citizens?

Who can number the stifled sobs and wasted agonies, the delirious ravings and dying spasms? How many Sabbath-breakers, murders and crimes; how many paupers, widows and maniacs, are left behind in this yearly process of ruin? One hundred and thirty thousand widows and orphans are made annually in our country by the rum-curse.

All this shame is brought about by the gain of the rumseller and the depraved appetite of his victims, which numerically are only a minority of our citizens and constitute the most of the crime and poverty of the land. If these stupendous calamities came upon the people from any other source they would not bear it an hour. The whole nation would be in arms. These evils are manifest and palpable; they are bitter, cruel and deadly.

Is there no relief? Must this country, oppressed with this unmitigated curse and cruel wrong, sit down in despair, and allow this desolating tide to sweep on? No! in God's name, no!

A united Christian church can, if she will, with the blessing of God, stop this fearful ruin. Let the pulpit, the silver trump of God, give no uncertain sound on this subject. Let the eighty-three thousand, six hundred and thirty-seven Christian ministers and twelve million, five hundred thousand church members unite with all temperance men and philanthropists, and they can dry up the rivers of this abomination, notwithstanding avarice, appetite, spite and craft are all united to sustain the supremacy of the rum power. Shall the Christian minister and the church of God be dumb and do nothing regarding this evil? The church of Christ is to stand where God stands against all sin, all evil and all wrong.

That is wrong which injures the mind, morals, health, or property of others, or any human being. That the sale and use of intoxicating drinks is the cause of one-half of all our diseases, three-fourths of all our rowdyism, four-fifths of all our crime, three-fourths of all our idleness, nine-tenths of all our pauperism, and one-half of all our taxes, is beyond question.

Rum-selling and drinking, by every just standard of measurement, is the most immoral and demoralizing habit and business pursued on earth. The injury inflicted by it on buyer, seller and society is immeasurable and incalculable. It is wide-spread, overwhelming and appalling. It beggars description. The earth itself groans under it, and is full of lamentation, weeping and woe.

Profanity, Sabbath-breaking, stealing, lying and counterfeiting are only drops compared to this fearful giant curse. Rum-selling and drinking are in direct and fearful antagonism to Christianity. We have two hundred and fifty thousand places where intoxicating liquors are sold, and five hundred and fifty thousand persons dealing out the poison and death. The saloons of the United States would form a solid street from Philadelphia to New York. Our drunkards and rumsellers would form a solid procession a hundred miles long and ten abreast.

The church should unite and crush out this evil, in pity and mercy to these more than half a million rum-sellers. If she does not help them, or compel them to help themselves, by giving up their business, they will inevitably be lost and suffer the curse of God. "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to his lips." The church is under obligation to half a million drunkards' wives, and more than three millions of drunkards' widows and children to meet her responsibility and her duty regarding this great evil. Woman is the great sufferer from drunkenness.

> "See her chained mid want and strife,
> That lonely thing, a drunkard's wife."

She stands in rags and poverty, surrounded by her hungry, ruined children, and stretches her bony arms and cries: "Oh, save my husband, and help me to make him what he once was! Do not license, or allow men to thrust in his pathway the tempter that is dragging him to ruin! Shut up that charnel house of his body and soul. Bolt the door to that deep, dark pit to the damned! Oh, help me to save my husband!"

Every Christian man and woman should raise their voice, and heart, and hand against this withering, blighting curse, and never hold their peace, nor cease their prayers, nor stay their efforts, until the drink curse is banished from the world.

Philomath, Ore.

"AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY."

The following able oration was delivered in the oratorical contest of Oberlin College, Jan. 19, 1894. It is replete with most admirable and timely ideas, and will serve as a counter-influence to that love of militarism that is so largely prevalent. It is with deep regret that I notice that ex-President Harrison recommended the introduction of military drill into our colleges, and that Secretary Lamont has far more applications than he can supply for army officers to be detailed to teach military tactics. The excuse usually given is that military drill gives physical discipline. One would suppose that gynasiums and athletic parks might answer instead of teaching the art of homicide. How much better to have in each college a society for the promotion of universal peace. H. H. HINMAN.

The condition of European affairs to-day is most critical. National boundary lines bristle with standing armies. Fearless Russian Cossacks with tightened rein can hardly wait for the command. The volcano of French hatred threatens a second eruption. The war idea dominates everything. Battle ranks are filling. War debts are doubling. The question of defense is paramount. You can almost hear the rush of cavalry, the mutter of artillery, the tread of mighty armies. The cry, "to arms" sends into the field twelve million men, a force ten times greater, a thousand times more effective, than the world has ever seen.

What treasures of life, labor and capital this army holds in its power! In the last two European wars ten billion dollars were spent and no one was a penny richer; count the real cost and arithmetic fails you. War sweeps over the land like a tornado. What is left? Mutilated bodies, devastated lands and blighted homes.

The moral aspect is even more gloomy. War is the suspension of moral law, the triumph of brute force. It is a strange logic of government that says one murder makes a felon, thousands a hero. Was it heroism or murder that butchered two hundred thousand a year during the Civil War? Let the widows and orphans of a million homes answer. We all know the horrors of war and the blessings of peace; yet how little is done to abolish the one and foster the other. Whence then comes our hope? What is the remedy?

It lies in a permanent International Court, similar to our Supreme Court, yet broader in scope, embracing the best talent of the whole world. The choice of judges will be made by an international conference and ratified by the different governments; at least one judge from each country represented; appointments for life; salaries paid from a common fund furnished by the nations proportionally.

A court thus formed will be as unbiased as our Supreme Court. Before it nations will be confident of a fair hearing. Selfish advocates of "My country right or wrong" will be superseded by men of broader views of justice and of international reputation.

It is better than simple arbitration, just as the experienced jurist is better than the pettifogger. Special courts with each new case must set up their standard of justice and win their reputation. A permanent court needs no preliminaries; it is always ready to act, and around it grows up that confidence and stability which wins, which satisfies, which commands all nations.

Such a court, founded on the eternal principles of justice, will give us a code of laws world-wide in application; and until such a court is founded, divided Europe, with all her ancient feuds, will never see the reign of peace.

The direct benefits of this court are manifold. It will save millions of lives and billions in money and property. Every harbor will be open to commerce. Armies which now eat up the bread of the common people will finally be disbanded. We shall be lifted out of the marshes and lowlands of strife up to the heights of peace and prosperity.

If we had such a court to-day England would not oppress Burmah. France would be ashamed to urge her unjust claims on Siam. The Triple Alliance would not mean financial thralldom for Italy.

But, says the Pessimist, international law can not be enforced. It has no sanction. No sanction? What is the sanction of Ohio's law to-day? Not the handful of police, not months or years of penal service, but the moral sentiment of the average man and woman. Were it not for ambitious rulers the moral sense of European citizens would crush the war spirit.

Let sullen Bismarck with his "blood and iron" policy thunder out "War is eternal." The idea is a generation behind the times. Modern civilization prophesies the abolition of war.

Unity is the watchword of the Nineteenth Century. Italy and Germany stand as monuments of it. It is manifestly easier to maintain peace between a few states than between many; hence, as unity increases, war decreases.

The growth of democracy will eventually destroy war. When the people who bear the brunt of war have their full rights, differences between jealous rulers will not be settled by bloodshed. The World's Congress of Labor declared rather than be used as targets for an enemy they would rebel.

The spirit of humanity is tearing away the motives for war. We are learning that we rise with others, not on them. Education is destroying old national prejudices. Electricity makes us neighbors to all mankind. Foreign investments, mail service, and commerce bind the whole world together. A breach of the peace is like tearing the body apart, limb at a time.

We live at the dawn of a great international age. No longer can two nations engage in war without involving others. We do not speak of a German and French war, but a European war. The interests at stake are myriad. It makes even nations pause and shudder before they plunge into destructive strife. They are beginning to look for some other way to settle their disputes.

The marked success of arbitration shows the tendency of the times. It is an invincible argument in favor of a permanent court. Arbitration is the forerunner. It works quietly, but its foundation principle of justice will revolutionize the relations of all Christendom. It does not assume that might makes right, but lets reason judge, convict whom it will. Successfully tried in over a hundred cases, it speaks for itself. True, the arbitrators have often been called when battle flags were flying and public sentiment was boiling, and in their excitement have made mistakes, but the greatest mistake that can be made is not equal to the mistake of war. Let court decision err farther than it has ever done, still it is infinitely cheaper and better than a resort to brute force.

Yet all present influences, however strong, can hardly make a ripple on the Dead Sea of public opinion. Nothing can be done until the convictions of men are stirred to the very depths.

The real nature of war must be stamped on public sentiment. Literature is charged with the war spirit. The ardor and beauty of war are depicted, not its horrors. Every third-rate military hero is made an idol. The real heroes are unhonored and unsung. Until we produce a new war literature the words of Whittier will continue to be profoundly true:

> "Still shall the glory and pomp of war
> Along their train the shouting millions draw,
> Still shall the bard to valor tune his song,
> Still hero-worship kneel before the strong."

History, too, forgets the measureless sufferings of the field, the hearts wrung at home, the aged father and mother going down in sorrow to the grave, and makes the charge of the "Six Hundred" a heroic act. It was a fool-hardy loss of life.

Poetry tells us how the enemy came down like a wolf on the fold, how they charge on their foe, turn on them their own guns and win a glorious victory. Let the smoke clear away; cruel, ghastly death stares you in the face; the air quivers with moans and death-groans; the earth is damp with human blood. Once let the sunlight of truth shine in on any battle-field and it shows that there is nothing more terrible than a great victory.

Then, too, nations must be made to see that prosperity and the maintenance of a large standing army cannot exist together. It is folly for Christian nations to prepare for a millennium by beating their plowshares into swords. Krupp guns have no relation to justice or morality. Why is Europe as restless as a caged lion to-day? Let Germany, groaning under the burden of her standing army, answer. Let bankrupt Italy and mail-clad Russia reply. Europe is shackled hand and foot by her armor; her prosperity is doomed, until she sees that the cure for war lies not in enmity and strife entrenched in arms, but in confidence and co-operation that come only from disarming. Penn among the savages, with nothing but the olive branch for defense, and Switzerland without a soldier on duty to-day, show us what can be done.

But who is to champion this noble cause? The whole world turns to America, the advocate of peace, the champion of arbitration. With our past history of successful arbitrations, what will be expected in the future? The Behring Sea case marks an epoch in history. Future writers will refer to it as the main influence in establishing the permanent court. Twenty years ago the Behring Sea trouble would have been settled by war; to-day it is settled by arbitration. And Judge Harlan, an American deciding in every case against America, because she was wrong, deserves more credit than if he had conquered all Europe.

Our government is based on the principle of an international court. The United States owes her very name to the establishment of a permanent tribunal. The colonies were independent states until they were joined under the Supreme Court. So we can prove by an object-lesson that it is practicable.

Our country is providentially appointed for the work, Laved on either coast by mighty oceans, with lakes, dedicated to peace on the north, and no one to fear on the south, we are free to propose any plan of disarming and fear no encroachment. We are free from all entangling alliances and can be suspected of nothing but the purest philanthropy. So then it is the majestic possibility of the United States to rise above all petty national jealousies and speak peace to the nations across the sea.

The day-star of reform is already above the horizon. The time is ripe for action. The watchword, "Ground arms!" The foundation of the reform is laid. Our government has entered into three hundred distinct treaties of arbitration. (Berne Peace Congress Report, 1892.) It is no longer the exception. It is the rule. England and the United States are committed to permanent arbitration. The ink is hardly dry on the treaty. The next step is a permanent court. Within six months the plan has been presented to every civilized ruler in the world. The iron is at a white heat. Strike the blow and weld the nations into a mighty brotherhood. Extend the principles of the Pan-American Congress until they are Pan-Human.

The unparalleled growth and prosperity of our country have been the wonder and admiration of the nations all this Columbian year. What an opportunity to teach them that we attained it not by armies but by peace!

American colleges hold a commanding position in the work. They train the brain that rules our land, and by wisely planned courses, teaching true principles of justice, they can help shape the policy of all nations. Three colleges already have professors of arbitration. Every teacher should have a vital part in this reform. Shake off your classic lethargy and be practical men. The world needs you.

Fathers, in the name of outraged families, condemn the evil of war by advocating this court of peace. Refuse to warm the earth with the life-blood of your sons.

Philanthropist, in the name of humanity and brotherhood, substitute court justice for brute force. Make "Peace" the rallying cry of the twentieth century.

Student, truth requires you to tear off from war its glamor and tinsel and show how repulsive it is. Never be satisfied until the sound public opinion is created that political, commercial and social prosperity are possible only with peace. And when that day comes—and it will come—the great battles of the world will be fought on moral grounds and intellectual heights. Then will

> ".....the war drums throb no longer, and the battle flags be furled
> In the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

MASONIC PLOTTING.

El Tiempo, of Mexico, publishes a dispatch from El Paso, Texas, as follows: "Charles S. Morse, of Austin, went yesterday from this place for the purpose of visiting the Governor of Chihuahua to arrange some matters of interest to the Masons; fortunately he met him in El Paso del Notre, where they had a personal interview. Mr. Morse brought letters from Gov. Hogg, from various members of the State Senate, and from the Grand Masters, Cochran and Tyler, to the Governor of Chihuahua. Besides these letters, he brought one from President Diaz, who is a Mason of the 33d degree, and is the Grand Commander of the Grand Symbolical Organization of Mexico, requesting that the petition of Mr. Morse be granted. In company with Charles Davis, Judge Edwards and George Swenk, Mr. Morse requested an interview with Senor Ahumada who received them cordially, and, after an interview of two hours, it seems the business which was the liberation of a criminal who was there in prison, was fully arranged. Mr. Morse will leave to-morrow for Houston, bearing a private letter from Gov. Ahumada for the Grand Masonic Lodge of the State. Senor Ahumada is a member of the 32d degree of the Scottish rite of Masons which is the only one recognized in Mexico."

Thus it is, we always find the Freemasons the friends, the abettors of criminals and the apologists for crime. The French Masons were in close communication with the chiefs of the German army, during the seige of Paris, and kept them informed of what was passing within the city. The French Masons, with no little aid from a portion, at least, of the American press, wrecked and ruined the Panama canal. The Italian Masons have wrecked the Bank of Rome and other institutions, and ruined—no, not ruined—the character of some of the leading "statesmen," in Italy—temporarily—but their motto is "resurga." They are sure to turn up again, like other criminals, with the help of "honorable" citizens like Morse, Gov. Hogg, of Texas, Grand Masters like Cochran and Tynan; Presidents of Republics like Diaz, Governors, like Ahumada, and others like Davis, "Judge" Edwards, and Swenk, who travel about to obtain the release of criminals. The Brazilian Masons banished Dom Pedro, because he abandoned the craft, and became reconciled with the church before his return from Europe. This country is now aiding Peixato, the usurper and the tyrant, who calls himself President of that "Republic," to suppress a rebellion which had its origin in his cruelty and selfishness. Pardons are granted to rogues and cut-throats who may be imprisoned in this country, some say through the agency of politics, some say through the intrigues of Freemasons; probably both are acting in concert with the American Protective Association, who are seeking the destruction of the Catholic Church in this country, as the "Fraternity" headed by the Jewish Masons are trying to do in Europe.—Catholic Review.

CHIEF JUSTICE MARSHALL was the intimate friend and biographer of Washington, and was himself a Freemason in his youth. Marshall left the lodge in 1793. He had then for some sixteen years been acquainted with Washington, who died six years later. Marshall wrote to Hon. John Bailey from Richmond, Oct. 18, 1833, of Washington and Freemasonry: "I do not recollect ever to have heard him utter a syllable on the subject."

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The Romance of Nations —A Referendum.—Rome and Woman's Suffrage.— The Use of Education.—Harvard's Last Bequest —A Cruel Fashion.—A Police Story.—A Cheerful Truth.

An African explorer recently said: "Take my word for it, Africa is the hope of the future, and will be the salvation of an overcrowded world." Forty years ago Mrs. Stowe prophesied, in the preface of her wonderful book, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," that Africa would yet be the home of a different and higher form of civilization than the world has yet seen. I once heard the thought advanced, by a very devoted student of the prophetic Scriptures, that in the brief but fiery tribulation of the last days Africa may be a refuge for Christ's people, like the hills about Pella to the Jewish Christians at the siege of Jerusalem. It would be no more strange than some other things that have happened in the world's history. Who, for instance, would have dreamed, in the Middle Ages, when America was only a goal for lawless adventurers, thirsty for gold and cruel as any Arab slave-trader of the present day, that out of one little corner of this vast continent, whose rocky shores, beaten by the fierce Atlantic, produced neither gold nor diamonds to tempt cupidity, was to go forth the light which has made her the sanctuary of civil and religious freedom? Of one thing we may be certain, that Africa has a large part—we know not how large—in God's divine purposes. Another romance of nations even more startling than this, if true, is embodied in Dr. Geo. B. Peck's address at the recent convention of the Christian Alliance, which was of peculiar interest even to those who do not believe his Anglo-Israel theory: that the English-speaking races are the lost tribes of Israel, in whom the promise made to Abraham of worldwide dominion for his posterity has been fulfilled. It is certainly quite as pleasant as to think of our ancestors at that period as naked savages. So why not accept it? What a romance to crown the tragedy of the captivity and dispersion! And when we come to think of it, how strangely full is Jewish history, as regards individual lives, of such sudden and romantic changes. The prisoner is raised from his dungeon to become Egypt's prime minister; a peasant woman of Moab comes down to us in the sacred page as the mother of a line of kings; a humble shepherd-boy rises to be the founder of a royal dynasty. So, if the "scattered and peeled" tribes of ancient Israel have actually reappeared, as Dr. Peck thinks, in the two mightiest nations of the world, it is only the individual romance become national and re-enacted on a gigantic scale measured by ages instead of man's brief span.

The idea of a referendum, or the submission to popular vote for acceptance or rejection of laws affecting the interests of the people, is favored by Governor Greenhalge, and endorsed by both the political parties. This is a measure greatly in the interests of reform, and it is to be hoped will become a law eventually. It is strongly favored by the Nationalists as a step towards the realization of their Utopia. The late decision of the U. S. Supreme Court, that the State has the right to regulate the conduct and fix the prices of any business that affects the public interest, seems to look very plainly towards Nationalism; for though the particular case in question related to the transportation of grain, is there any honest or useful business that does not more or less affect the public interest? Only let our courts dispense even-handed justice, and when they declare strikes unlawful that interfere with the regular course of business, declare at the same time lockouts of corporations and capitalists "unlawful" on the same principle.

There was quite an exciting time at the adjourned hearing before the Committee on Woman's Suffrage. The special speaker in opposition was Donovan of Boston, whose argument was that thread-bare one so dear to the heart of the liquor-seller, that "the men should look after the polls, and the women after the homes." Mrs. Trask Hill followed in a brief but pungent speech, in which she said, in reference to the condition of several of the city wards, "the heel of tyranny oppresses the voter." This brought out the question, from another representative of the green isle and Rome, "Where is the tyranny?" "Just where I have stated," fearlessly answered Mrs. Hill. "The people there are priest-ridden. There is no liberty." This caused Mr. Donovan to wax as irate as a lodgeman at an anti-secret convention, and he proceeded to a warm but rather amusing defence of "our priests," who "never interfere in politics, but spend all their time preaching salvation." The committee voted to give the petitioners leave to withdraw. In this bitter fight against municipal suffrage for woman, it is easy to see the hand of Rome. She has not forgotten the overturn in Boston seven years ago.

Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, in her report to the State Board of Education, says that there has been for some time an increase in the number of women, with a decrease in the number of men teachers. At the same time the average salaries of the men have slightly increased, and the salaries of the women decreased. She attributes this state of things to the large number who try teaching as a mere temporary makeshift, with no thought of taking it up as a profession, and therefore make no adequate preparation. School-teaching has been conducted on a different plane from almost any other business. It is not enough to have all the "ologies" at the tongue's end, and be a walking eneyclopedia of knowledge, if one has never learned how to impart that knowiedge to young and untrained minds. Education is like a fine and costly tool. Simple possession may be a grand thing, but the chief point is to know how to use it. And it seems to me that it is in just this particular that our higher education so frequently fails;—the student is not taught to apply his knowledge in a way to make it of practical benefit to himself or others.

Harvard has just received another legacy; this time from the widow of the late Lewis Hayden, of Boston, to found a scholarship for needy colored students. Mr. and Mrs. Hayden were born in slavery, and fled North, their adventures being among the most stirring and heroic episodes of anti-bellum times. It is said that the total amount received by Harvard from women since Lady Anne Radcliffe sent her fifty pounds across the water, down to this legacy from Mrs. Hayden, exceeds the amount received by all the women's colleges. Such generosity on their part deserves a better recognition from Harvard. Even now the Annex is at best a mere back-stairs attachment. Why not open the front door to women, and invite them in without any shifts or evasions, as the Wesleyan University has done?

It is a pity that fashionable people cannot think of any more tasteful or humane fad than that of wearing live chamelleons fastened by a tiny gold chain to the dress or coat. Darting about on the trees and shrubs of their native Florida, they are objects of beauty and interest. Made to do duty as a miscalled ornament, they are only objects of disgust and pity. As it is impossible to supply them with their proper insect food they can but perish miserably by slow starvation. It is of a piece with that cruel thoughtlessness which will wear birds' bodies and wings, unmindful of the suffering, or the silenced songs in places that had before been vocal with melody; unmindful, too, that the economy of nature is thereby disturbed, and the constant struggle of the farmer and the horticulturist to keep down the winged and crawling pests that invade field and garden is made still more discouraging. There is one consolation. The fad will not probably last long; but meanwhile let every right-minded person protest vigorously against it, both by precept and example. I am glad to see that the dissecting of animals in the public schools of Boston has been prohibited. It is difficult to see any good results from such a practice that will begin to compensate for its evil effects on young and tender minds.

A lady friend tells me the following incident, apropos both to the season and the manners of a certain class of Boston's Irish Romanist policemen. One of these guardians of the public peace rang her door-bell, one cold morning, and threatened her with the police court if she did not have the sidewalk before her house cleaned off in time "for the gurrls when they went to early mass." She informed him that there were only ladies in the house, and asked that he would send them a man to clean off the sidewalk. "Divil a bit will I be afther doing other folks' business," returned the blue-coated official, and went off in high dudgeon. But his brass was not all in his buttons, as evidenced by his ringing her door-bell again a little while after in the attempt to sell her a ticket to the policeman's ball, which for drunkenness and general infamy was one of the most scandalous orgies that ever disgraced Boston.

"We always may be what we might have been." There is profound philosophy as well as heavenly cheer in this saying of Madame Willard, quoted by her daughter in her annual address. God help us to make it a glad truth, both for ourselves and others.

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 31, 1894.

Representative Morse, of Massachusctts, speaking of the resolution introduced in the House of Representatives by himself and in the Senate by Senator Frye, providing for a Constitutional amendment recognizing God and the divinity of Jesus Christ, said: "It is a remarkable fact that neither the Constitution nor the Declaration of Independence have a direct reference to divine power. A movement was made, ten years ago, to secure a suitable amendment to the Constitution, and quite an agitation ensued, but it was not successful. The present movement was inaugurated by influential gentlemen in Pittsburgh and Baltimore. The amendment, if agreed to by Congress, would, of course, have to be referred to the States for ratification, but that formality would be quickly complied with, as the Christian element in the various States has a controlling influence. The amendment is, I believe, acceptable to all religious denominations."

Senator Kyle has introduced, by request, a bill requiring United States officials to be temperate. The idea is all right, but it would be better to substitute for the somewhat complicated and clumsy preamble and three sections of this bill one with a single section, simply adding to the oath which every official takes upon assuming office the words—"and I solemnly swear to abstain from the use of all intoxicating liquor as a beverage while I remain in the employ of the government." The great good that would be accomplished by such a law may not be so apparent elsewhere as in Washington, where there are so many intemperate employes, men whose families suffer for lack of the money they spend in rum shops. But, aside from its moral effect, would it not be a good move from a common-sense, business point of view to compel all officials to abstain from the use of intoxicating liquor?

The most interesting event of the week in the Senate was the short speech made by Senator Sherman in favor of the right of Secretary Carlisle to issue bonds. It is all too rare in Congress for a political opponent of an administration to make a speech endorsing any act of that adminstration. It was this fact that gave unusual force to Mr. Sherman's language, coming, as it did, just after the failure of the attempt of the Knights of Labor to get an injunction from the Supreme Court of the Dfstrict of Columbia to prevent the issue of bonds tomorrow, in accordance with Secretary Carlisle's announcement. Mr. Sherman said: "The Secretary of the Treasury has full power to sell bonds to maintain the gold reserve. It is his duty to do so. This is the first time in fifteen long years that any one has denied that power. It never has been disputed before. It is almost unpatriotic to question this power at a time when the revenues of the government are insufficient to meet the expenditures. It is a question that should be above partisan discussion. I feel like standing up for the honor of the country and for the power of the Secretary of the Treasury." Before concluding, he said: "I regard the credit of the United States government as safe in the hands of Grover Cleveland and John G. Carlisle as if it was in the hands of a Republican."

The debate over the tariff bill, with its income tax amendment, is drawing to a close in the House of Representatives. The final vote will be taken tomorrow, and it is considered certain that the bill will pass.

The news from Brazil aroused the keenest interest, but no excitement, here. The administration and members of Congress who know him have every confidence in the discretion and conversatism of Admiral Benham, who is in command of the American vessels in Brazilian waters. His instructions were to protect American interests, and the feeling is general here that whatever he has done has been done solely with that end in view.

The most prominent official in Washington who teaches a Sunday-school class, is Justice Brewer, of the U. S. Supreme Court. He has a large Bible class of adults, and he never misses a Sunday, if he is in the city, unless compelled by sickness to do so. He is said to give the same study and care to preparing for the lesson that he does to preparing an opinion upon an important legal case; and those who have had the pleasure of listening to his Bible talks to his class, speak in the highest terms of his ability as an expounder of the Scriptures.

Everything seems to be moving auspiciously in the preparations for the Moody and Sankey meetings. The great chorus of 1,500 voices is actively rehearsing. This week a series of union meetings are being held in a number of our churches, preparatory to the great revival, and public interest is being manifested to an unusual extent. Great things are expected, and many prayers are being offered in behalf of the expectations. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE COMING PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

457 NORTH SIXTH ST.,
PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 1, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Some have asked why the call for our approaching convention has been issued so soon, and the program prepared at this early date. It is that a larger number may hear of our gathering and prepare to attend than would otherwise. February is here. Friends will see the importance of extending the notice as widely as possible.

There are doubtless those you would like to meet at this convention. Send them an invitation with a program. I expect to have 10,000 programs printed soon, and will be glad to furnish all that friends can use to advantage.

I wish, once more, to call attention to the appointment of delegates. Some churches in sympathy with us have appointed them. Has yours? If the churches with which you are connected have not acted in this manner, please ask them to do so at once, and notify me of those expecting to meet with us.

A report of those coming should be sent in, that entertainment may be secured for them. A friend from the western part of the State writes that he expects to bring his wife; that's right. Ladies are welcome at all our meetings.

Encouraging letters come from many. I will report a few. Dr. H. H. George writes: "If I can I will come to your convention; if I be not able to come, will pray God's richest blessing on it and you." The doctor is now engaged in bringing religious amendments to the attention of Congressmen, hoping to secure favorable action on the same. He says: "I succeeded yesterday (Jan. 26) in getting our religious amendment to the Constitution introduced into both houses of Congress, and referred to their respective committees." As the doctor's work is so near, we may reasonably expect to hear from him at the convention. Rev. James Parker, pastor of the Second U. P. church, Jersey City, rather modestly (I will not say bashfully), declines my invitation to have his name appear on the program, bnt says: "I expect to attend your convention." Three brethren from Quakertown write of their expectation to attend. Quakertown should send a dozen delegates. Come along, friends. Rev. Allen M. Fretz, Mennonite pastor, residing at Souderton, writes of receiving a copy of the Cynosure containing the convention notice. He will be glad to meet with us, and gives names of others who may attend.

I am glad that we are likely to have Bro. Stephen Merritt with us. God has wonderfully delivered him from lodge bondage and is helping him to warn others.

Feeling the need of a little rest, I have been at home some days. I hope soon to tell Cynosure readers of the good work being accomplished by the Washington Central Union Mission. It is doing a grand work under the supervision of our brother, E. D. Bailey.

I am advertised to speak at Grater's Ford next Sabbath. Early in the week I expected (D. V.) to attend a conference of the Mennonite brethren, which is being held at Terre Hill, Lancaster county.

I shall expect to be in Philadelphia again by the time this letter reaches our friends. Let constant prayer be made for this important gathering. Masonry has probably no stronger hold than in Philadelphia. The iniquity that its Christ-rejecting temple is perpetuating here is permeating the whole moral atmosphere. Truly in this contest "we wrestle not against flesh and blood but against principalities and powers, against spiritual wickedness in high places." Who will come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty? W. B. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

BROTHER HINMAN IN NEBRASKA.

HUMBOLDT, Neb., Feb. 2, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have been here for a week, engaged in evangelistic work in a country church. I have preached six times with increasing congregations and growing interest. There are indications of a work of grace in the minds and hearts of the people. We hope, the Lord willing, to continue our meetings for some days to come. I have been wonderfully helped of God in this work, and am, I trust, truly gratified that I may be an instrument in his hand to save men from their sins.

I find that while no special attention has been given to the lodge question, yet there is a general agreement that membership in secret societies is out of harmony with the service of Christ, and a general willingness to hear the truth on this subject. Bro. Gault visited this place when he labored in this State, but failed to lecture because of other meetings, but not for want of sympathy with the cause.

This is a beautiful, fertile country, and the winter has been delightful. The people are intelligent, industrious and temperate, and as much prospered as any of the farming communities in the West.

I expect soon to go 200 miles farther west, where the people live mainly in sod houses. I desire the prayers of your readers.

H. H. HINMAN.

A FAITHFUL SHEPHERD.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., Jan. 26, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—While secret societies are multiplying all about us, and apparently gaining, in some quarters, in popular favor, still an undertone of sentiment can be detected in strong sympathy with the principles of our reform, and which occasionally comes to the surface in unexpected places.

Rev. E. E. Phillips, the faithful and fearless pastor of the Methodist Episcopal church, in Riverside, R. I., on last Sunday (21st) gave utterance to many strong truths. He gave a clear testimony against an unconverted choir in church services, Sunday trains and cars, Sunday shore-resorts, the Sunday newspaper, sensational sermon advertising, and secret societies.

In discoursing upon the subject of sin and the atonement of Christ, he presented, in illustration, a jar of pure water, which he said represented the purity of Adam's heart before he fell. He then brought into view a bottle containing tincture of iron, a black substance, which was labeled "Sin." Enlarging upon the fact that the least taint of sin would defile the purest nature, he poured a few drops of the tincture into the jar of water and the whole of the pure water was immediately changed into a black liquid. Turning, then, to speak of the efficacy of the blood of Christ to cleanse the blackest heart from all sin, he introduced a little bottle filled with a red liquid (bromine) and, pouring a little of it into the black water in the jar, it speedily became pure and transparent again, tinged with just a little yellow, which, the preacher remarked, symbolized the sunshine filling the heart of the redeemed one.

Notwithstanding the blood of Christ is so efficacious in curing the disease of sin, and, indeed, is the only cure, yet many turn from it, to the peril of their souls, resorting to patent remedies to obtain that relief which "the blood" alone can give. Among other patent remedies, he mentioned secret societies, which, sad to say, even some church members seemed to value above the genuine remedy; for some had said: "If I leave either the church or the lodge, it will be the church."

This is but a little of what this true, bold minister of God spoke for God and truth that day; but this little will give an idea of the man, and of his purpose. God grant to fill his church with such men. A. M. P.

FRATERNITY VS. CHRIST.

CHICAGO, February 1, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—The installation of officers of the Knights of Honor at Putney, Vt., one evening in the latter part of January, was remarkable (as I learn from a local paper sent to me by a friend) for several things. First, it is described as "the social and musical triumph of the season." To the music of Gen. Sigel's grand march, the guests made a successful attack upon "a delightful supper of scalloped oysters and choice sweetmeats," which the Knights and their ladies speedily vanquished.

Hon. Henry Clark then conducted the public installation exercises in due form, and afterward delivered his Knightly address on "The Spirit of Fraternity." I shall not undertake to tell your readers all the pretty things that he said in glorification of oath-bound brotherhoods. It was remarkable for his belief in the sufficiency of fraternity to meet and overcome the trials of life, entirely ignoring the consolations of Christianity and divine help. He began by saying: "The spirit of humanity and fraternity is the demand of the day and generation—it is the cry of the hour.....A great republic of humanity is being builded, whose foundations are the intellectual and physical needs of the race, the age, the generation and the hour. Temples are arising whose corner-stone is the brotherhood of man, and the cry of the worshipers is the voice of the nations. Benevolence, charity and love to one another is the creed." Afterward he said: "Knighthood makes no note of, concerns itself not about, the questions of dogmas relating to the great hereafter. The only doctrinal faith is that in which is held the brotherhood of man."

Isn't it strange that with such men humanity and fraternity should be everything and ignore the divine Author and our utter dependence upon him for all that we have, all that we are, and all that we desire to be and have, in this world and the next; to believe that it is wisdom to put our money and faith in human endowment fraternities instead of in the source of all good—of life and health and every human comfort and joy? Not so did David, when he said: "All my springs are in Thee." Strange that the infatuation of the lodge should blind so many worthy men to the best interests of their being.

There is a secret society of considerable popularity, similar in fraternal principles to the Knights. They call themselves "The Modern Woodmen." I know nothing of them more than they tell the world through their lodge-organs. But I am sure that they are no friends of the Lord Jesus Christ, They take one of the fine old Christian hymns—"Why do you wait?" and mangle it to suit their lodge religion. Take the first verse:

Why do you wait, dear brother,
Oh, why do you tarry so long?
Your Saviour is waiting to give you
A place in his sanctified throng.

CHORUS—

Why not, why aot, why not
Come to him now?

The Woodmen's version:

Why do you wait, dear Neighbor,
Oh, why do you tarry so long?
The Woodmen are waiting to give you
A place within their throng.

CHORUS—

Why not, why not, why not
Come to them now?
Why not, why not, why not
Come to them now?

What do you hope, dear Neighbor,
To gain by further delay?
The best insurance is the Woodmen;
They are sure your money to pay.

Why do you wait, dear Neighbor,
Why not insure your life?
To leave behind you something
To keep your children and wife?

Now, why do you wait, dear Neighbor;
Your life is passing away;
The Woodmen are longing to help you,
Come now and help them to say,

CHORUS—Why not? etc.

—C. Boyer, in the Woodman.

But enough. Secret fraternities, it is certain, have nothing in common with Christ and Christianity.

"'Welsh pictures' is the work of ten Welshmen, among whom illustrating the beauties of Wales has been parcelled out according to the special familiarity of each. The result is a pleasing volume."—London Times.

THE EARTHLY FOOTPRINTS OF OUR RISEN LORD, Illumined.

A continuous narrative of the Four Gospels according to The Revised Version, with introduction by Rev. John Hall, D. D. Illustrated by 113 full-page half tone re-productions. Small 4to, cloth.....net 1.50
Gilt edge, with silk book mark, boxed.....net 2.00
Full morocco, flexible, gilt edges, round corners, boxed.....net 3.75

Pictures reflecting the best in sacred art from Raphael to the present day are scattered profusely through the book.

"To many the life of the Christ will be a new book in this form. Though beyond the introduction it contains no word except what is found in the four Gospels, yet when read continuously, without the breaks necessarily made by the different stories of the four evangelists, the narrative takes on new force and lifelikeness. The very fact that this is not our usual method of reading the Word will give it a new reality."—Golden Rule.

A GIFT OF LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper-cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects. By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

OBITUARY.

FRANCIS TRUMAN WOODRUFF

was born in Litchfield, Conn., in the year 1832. He lived near Collinsville, in that State, until he was 22 years of age, when he moved to Kansas.

On the 15th of August, 1862, he enlisted in company B, 12th Kansas Volunteer Infantry, and was honorably discharged at Little Rock, Ark., May 26, 1865.

He was married to Miss Catharine Shields, Nov. 9, 1865. The bereaved wife testifies that as a young man he was pure-minded, upright, and true in all his dealings.

He was always a firm believer in the Bible and Christianity, and was converted at the age of 43; but, owing to moving away from church privileges, he did not unite with any church. His choice was the United Brethren in Christ. He was opposed to all lodges.

Though a great sufferer for years, he never lost sight of Christ, and his duty to him. He always led the family in their devotions, when able to be out of bed, and ever encouraged the family to attend church when at all practicable,

He was a good husband, a loving father, a true neighbor, a loyal citizen, and a patriotic soldier in time of our country's need.

He died at his home near Philomath, Ore., Jan. 17, 1894, aged 62 years. Thus, one by one, the old veterans are answering to the last roll call.

The family are true Christians, and have a good hope of meeting again.

MODERN NAVAL PRACTICE.

Those who have watched the civil war now in progress in Brazil are aware that the naval fleet controlled by the "insurgents"—one party in the contest—has for several weeks maintained an effective blockade in the harbor of Rio Janeiro, the principal sea-port of that unhappy country.

Its trade and commerce is usually immense and has gradually increased, as foreign countries have largely purchased. Indeed, it has enjoyed a greater share of commercial prosperity with all civilized nations than any other port in South America. The stoppage of this important commerce by the unfortunate revolution in Brazil and the present blockade has therefore been deeply and extensively felt.

It has hitherto been a rule among nations that, under such circumstances, merchant vessels must take their own chances if they insist on entering a port, or departing from it, confronted by the stringency of a naval blockade. But a German in authority in Brazil notified the insurgents that German shipping must be permitted to enter, without molestation, any port in Brazil.

This bold stroke encouraged American and British merchants engaged in trade at Rio to petition their respective governments to follow the example of Germany and protect their wharf privileges. The British Minister, sustained by his home government, refused to interfere with the obstructions in the embargoed district, and the American minister received instructions from Washington to pursue a like policy.

Last week, however, Admiral Benham, in command of the United States squadron at Rio (maintaining the protection of our national interests at that port), assumed a responsibility that may, or may not, lead to some serious international complications, by firing upon insurgent Admiral De Gama's ship, without orders, for a reason similar to that which impelled the German commander to a like course.

The affair is now likely to assume grave international importance. If other nations (including Great Britain) sustain the action of Germany and the United States, all will be well; but if there is a division—some supporting the cause of the Brazilian insurgents, and recognizing them as belligerents—diplomacy will undergo a severe test, and arbitration will be required to restore peace.

It is thought that should the Brazilian insurgents be defeated by that government, Admiral Benham will escape severe punishment for his overt act, and an old international tradition will be practically broken down.

MORE MASONIC EXPERIENCES.

Very frequently we receive letters from esteemed subscribers and others, which it may be, for obvious reasons, impracticable to print in full; but to such correspondence we are often indebted for passages replete with Christian sentiment of a high order, and information that is opportune and full of interest.

One of these kind friends writes as follows: "I was talking with a man who stated that Masonry was instituted away beyond the age of Solomon. I told him that I had been close to the spot where it originated in London," (the Appletree Tavern), "and any one who has been to that part of the city knows that it, like Masonry, is very dark and dead—nothing but a low drinking-place,"

In another part of his letter, the writer, who is a traveling evangelist, says: "I am glad to say, (and I declare it with all my being), that from rivers to lakes, where my work has been among all classes of men, I do not see where Masonry is, morally speaking, any benefit, and much less spiritually.....People may say what they please in regard to Masonic deeds of charity, but I know, from talking with those that had fallen behind in paying their lodge-dues, how soon the fraternity will throw them aside as deadheads.....I hope we are not far from the time when we shall see every Christian church and minister stand up against the great evil, and it shall be rooted out from God's house and cast to the realms of the father of lies, from whom it came."

Another evangelist writes: "I feel impressed to make a few statements of what I have seen as I have been holding meetings, for revival work, in the Methodist, Baptist and Presbyterian churches.....I have never belonged to any secret order; I was always afraid that if I joined them I could not have freedom, and because I have witnessed two or three instances where those who were members of secret orders and did wrong, had a way of escaping the punishment which they deserved. I notice that when I come into a community of Masons, or Odd-fellows, or Knights of Pythias, I am found out the first day.....All through parts of Virginia, Kentucky and Tennessee, going from town to city, I am shunned and branded as a tramp or imposter. Yet I have a letter from my church, and others from churches in Virginia and Tennessee, but I am avoided. I have found ministers who would go ten miles, through snow and sleet, to attend lodge-meetings, even crossing dangerous creeks and rivers; while, right at their homes, within 300 or 400 yards of their dwellings, they cannot attend religious services, because it would give them colds to go out in the night air.....I have suffered more than any one can realize in communities where secretism reigns."

These are pictures from real life—experiences that put to shame the most vivid fictions of Masonic sophistry.

ANARCHY IN EUROPE.

Anarchism is showing itself, with more or less violence, in France, Italy, Spain, Russia, and England, and while the mischief that it has perpetrated thus far is not great, yet its disposition to turn and overturn the established institutions of order and good government is apparent. Its methods of assassination place its adherents within the pale of justice, and the strong arm of the law has descended upon some of them with fatal effect.

France has, perhaps, suffered more than the others by the presence of a large force of these madmen, and her intellectual rulers were for a time staggered by the audacity of the "reds," and were puzzled to learn the proper course to be pursued for their suppression. One of these—M. Zola, the distinguished realist—considers legislation inadequate to stay the flood of anarchistic doctrines, and confesses that the situation has shaken his convictions of the virtue of positivism. Hence we are not surprised to find him saying that "religious faith would have prevented such theories from spreading; but has it not well-nigh disappeared nowadays?" France is a powerful stronghold of Romanism—a religion that claims to be holy and the conservator of apostolic Christianity. Why has she suffered France to become such a nest of unclean birds? God and the world will hold her responsible for these barbarities.

It is evident that its suppression in the States where it exists will be comparatively easy whenever the order shall be given for its extinction. We have enough of it displayed in the United States, already; but if the "reds" are driven out of those states which they infest, there is danger that they will endeavor to find an asylum in America. To be aware of this in time, and to prepare for its prevention, would seem to be a positive duty on the part of our government. It will be too late when they reach our shores.

"INDUSTRIAL AND MILITARY."

These two adjectives briefly express the character of the new secret fraternity, originating in Chicago and Michigan within the past month, and known as "The Ancient Order of Loyal Americans." It starts out with the idea that it "will become the most powerful of the many kindred associations which have flourished on American soil." Its expectations are large, and its pretensions are of corresponding dimensions. "It is new, aggressive, patriotic and fraternal," having for its object "the perpetuation of American liberty and American institutions, the overthrow of monopoly, and the upbuilding of a state and national referendum."

Further, says Grand Commander Reynolds, of this promising institution, "we have endeavored to profit by the experiences of the well-meaning but vulnerable organizations which have preceded us. The Farmers' Alliance, Patrons of Industry, Patrons of Husbandry, etc., have been open only to a particular class of citizens, and have consequently been compelled to act upon the defensive from the start. The Ancient Order of Loyal Americans is open to all—farmers, laboring men and those engaged in business pursuits—provided they love the American flag and are loyal to the national constitution. In selecting our officers we have been particularly careful to avoid the granting of important commissions to men who have been prominent in the Populist party, as it is greatly to be desired that no suspicion of partisanship be attached to our order. It is secret, to be sure, but only in the advanced degrees. All political questions are discussed in places to which the public will have access, but we lay the most stress upon the workings of the referendum."

The military character of the concern is principally manifested, as yet, in the pompous "Grand Order No. 1" of the Grand Commander to the division Commanders in forty-two States of the Union. In Delaware, South Carolina and several Territories the fraternity, at last accounts, had no foothold. The following is a specimen of this general order issued to subalterns: "You are each and all hereby ordained, instructed and commanded to call about you such trustworthy assistants as you may select, obligate them in the language of the official oath, instruct them in the duties of the order and command them to report to you for duty on Monday, Jan. 22, 1894. You are further commanded to take the field at 12 o'clock, noon, on Monday, Jan 22, 1894, and proceed to organize your respective commands by the enlistment of loyal Americans, making a full report of the companies organized in the order of their muster, that charters may issue to the same. . . . To the faithful execution of all commands herein you are hereby enjoined."

To a peaceful community, in a time of profound national peace, such bombast would serve as a source of ridicule, did not its character stamp it as the expression of anti-republican principles, which depend upon the civil "government of the people by the people, for all the people," instead of coercive military discipline—to call it by no harsher name.

But that is the nature of the secret lodge system—to rule its members with a rod of iron, destroying their right to exercise private judgment, and making unquestioning allegiance to the lodge and its mandates the test of fidelity. It is ever the same—autocratic, over-bearing, case-hardening, and estranging men even from their duties to the home, the church and the public welfare.

The personale of this new "ancient" order is thus described:

"The Grand Commander is a mnn of medium build, somewhat careless of his dress and appearance, and is not at all military looking. C. Vincent, of Indianapolis, Ind., Grand Adjutant of the new order, is the founder and managing editor of the Non-Conformist, an anti-monopoly publication, which is quite a leading authority to some branches of the latter-day anti-monopolists. J. J. England, of Caro, Mich., is Grand Quarter-master. For several years he has been Grand Treasurer of the Patrons of Industry of Michigan, an association which attained in that State larger proportions than any other so-called reform organization within it. The Grand Chaplain is Rev. Myron S. Reed, of Denver, Colo., a prominent divine, who has made the subject of labor's emancipation his theme for years. Grand Ensign S. H. Piersol is a resident of Parkersburg, W. Va., and W. C. Bateman, Grand Sentinel, has long been a leader of the Farmers' Alliance movement in Maine. A. S. Partridge, who is one of the leading progenitors of the Ancient Order of Loyal Americans, has been rewarded by a place on the vicegerent, or executive committee of the order. He is at present Supreme Lecturer of the Patrons of Industry in five States, and has been identified with every farmers' organization that has existed in the United States since the Grange was conceived."

The basic principles of the order (subject to changes) are enunciated as follows:

The equal legal and political rights of all loyal Americans.

The prosecution as traitors of all armed forces not recognized by the constitution.

The establishment of postal savings banks.

The absolute non-inteference of any foreign power in American industries or American finance.

Governmental ownership or control of all national monopolies.

The reclaiming of all unearned land grants, the same to be held as homesteads for actual settlers.

Governmental issues of all money in sufficient volume to transact the business of the country on a cash basis.

The referendum of all legislation of vital importance.

The exclusion of European criminal and paupes labor, and the making of bribery a capital crime, to be dealt with as treason against the national government.

All meetings of the order for the discussion of political questions are open to the public, and a portion of the ritualistic work is given in open meeting. The order is divided into three independent degrees, to be known as the Workman, Knights Militant and National Council. The first is educational and semi-political, while the second and third are said to be purely fraternal.

—President Chas. A. Blanchard is announced to speak on Oath-bound secret societies, at Chicago Avenue church, in this city, on the evening of Monday, February 12. The invitation to attend is cordial and general.

—A minister of the Friends' church in Connecticut, renewing his subscription to the Cynosure, writes: "I enclose $—— for your worthy paper, which I read with great interest; and the more I read it, the more I like it. It cannot fail to do much good. Secret societies are a curse to humanity."

—The Laodicean spirit of the times is exhibited in the effort of about forty men and several women to organize, in this city, a "Christian Confederation" church, of which prohibition is to be the religious basis. Members of the W. C. T. U. have declared against the movement, having Nehemiah's excuse: "I am doing a great work, and cannot come down."

—The plea that the public schools do not foster the religious education of their pupils, and that the elements of religious instruction should be introduced into them, is like a two-edged sword—it cuts both ways. Better to keep all religion out of them (except the simple reading of the Scriptures), than subject them to the teachings of erratic religious sects.

—The librarian of an Eastern university writes, under date of Jan. 19: "I am a Mason, a Good Templar, a college fraternity man; but I like the Cynosure for its indomitable pluck, its perfect frankness and its obvious philanthropy. I have it where it can be freely consulted (in bound volumes), and index all the most important items myself." Such men are not afraid of the truth, although, as in this case, there is slowness in receiving it.

—Last summer, when the Directory of the Columbian Exposition refused on a certain Sabbath to open its gates to the public, in pursuance of a local court's decision in the injunction case brought by Mr. Stein to enforce an open Fair on Sunday, several officials of the Exposition were fined for contempt, in various sums. The State Supreme Court has just reversed the decision of the lower court, and their fines are declared uncollectable. This ends the miserable farce.

—The news of last week, that Satolli, the Pope's alter ego in the United States, is to be relieved of his duties here and made Archbishop of Bologna at the next papal consistory, seems to be well authenticated. There is talk, also, that Archbishop Ireland is to succeed Satolli as the papal ablegate. We give the intelligence for what it is worth. So far as Ireland's promotion is concerned, he is in favor with the Pope and his policy is not favorable to the peace and perpetuity of our common-school system.

—McNamara, the virulent ex-Roman Catholic priest, who recently made a public personal attack upon Priest Dalton at Kansas City, Mo., thereby creating the anger of a mob, has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment in jail and fined $500, on a charge of slander. McNamara, like the notorious "ex-priest" White in Illinois, has been a pestilent factor in stirring up the animosity of Roman Catholics in his harangues, displaying revolvers on the platform, and otherwise abusing his privileges as a pubiic lecturer. His punishment seems just.

—A common complaint: "The churches here are not half-filled. In the Congregational church there are not more than two—possibly, sometimes, three—young men at the Lord's table, while all the rest are beyond middle age, and the pastor admires and defends that vile abomination which is calling and holding the other young men in its secret, deadly embrace! The other churches here are in much the same condition. The Methodist pastor was lately elected, or appointed, Chaplain of the Masonic lodge." So writes a good brother from his home in the State of New York. His town is no exception to the general rule.

—Characteristic Chicago incidents: Alderman Mulvihill, owner of two liquor saloons and a brewery, was shot dead in another man's saloon, at a late hour, a few nights ago, by the owner of a saloon situated in another locality. A city detective, in attendance at a rowdy ball, was shot dead, at an early morning hour last week, by a city policeman, for creating a drunken disturbance. These items read like extracts from the Arizona Kicker, but they are solemn facts drawn from life in the great Western metropolis of the United States, and the outgrowth of the existing depravity that disgraces our municipal government.

—United States Senator Voorhees, Chairman of the Senate Committee on Finance, is sending out an official circular letter of inquiry, addressed respectively to manufacturers, importers, merchants, chambers of commerce and boards of trade, public officers, labor organizations of workingmen, and agriculturists, each of which contains a number of interrogatories on the subject of tariff rates and the existing depression in trade. The answers to these questions, it is expected, will have an influence in determining the consensus of public opinion on these subjects, and be instrumental in perfecting the degree of custom duties to be assessed on foreign imports classified in the pending tariff bills in Congress.

—It may not be generally understood that the action of the iniquitous Chinese exclusion law has been so modified by the President that no deportation of Chinese will take place for a year. The Christian Alliance, of New York, for January 5, quotes as follows from Mr. Geary, the author of this bill, who represents San Francisco in Congress: "I am perfectly willing to vote for a bill that requires every American missionary to return to his country within a year. I would do this just as I would vote to expel every anarchist from the United States within a year. The principle that would exclude anarchists from this country would keep American missionaries out of China." This language is perfectly consistent with the spirit that originated the Chinese exclusion law.

—A lady whose husband is an Odd-fellow, and who, of course, kept her in the dark concerning the lodge, accidentally discovered the existence of the National Christian Association and the character of its work and publications. "A short time ago," she writes, "I chanced to find, in my husband's possession, a copy of 'Revised Odd-fellowship,' with the Rebekah degrees, illustrated. I was astonished to find out so much relating to the order all at once, and yet I could not be quite satisfied that the book was correct, as no one seemed to know any such publications. Some of the gentlemen who belonged to lodges, swore that the institution" (the N. C. A.) "was all a fraud and a humbug to gull money out of simpletons like myself. Nevertheless I have been investigating the matter, and find all the signs true; in fact, it is all true enough. I belong to the degree of Honor and the Woman's Relief Corps; but these differ from the Rebekah and Eastern Star lodges. To make a long story short, I am trying to break up these last-named two lodges. . . . They have (or the Masons or Odd-fellows), in one great sense of the word, taken my husband from me; but I expect, with your help, to follow them up as long as I live." Every day we have these fresh and truthful testimonies against the evils of the lodge.

—"There is an evil which I have seen under the sun, and it is common among men." So wrote the Preacher (Eccl. 6: 1), and it is becoming altogether too common in our day. We refer to the growing practice among Bible commentators not only to misquote Scripture, but in their expositions to add or deduce conclusions not warranted by the text or corresponding passages in other parts of the Bible. Too often, we fear, the practice grows out of a desire to "popularize" (or modernize) the incident; sometimes it is due to carelessness, and less frequently, it is to be hoped, with an intention to distort the original meaning for sectarian purposes. Familiar illustrations of Bible truths, drawn from everyday life and events, and not strained for effect, are real helps to learners; but to corrupt a plain Bible statement is wrong, since it is easily detected and leaves a bad impression of the expositor's knowledge or honesty.

—A county official in Minnesota sends us a copy of the constitution and by-laws of the Minnesota State Farmers' Alliance, and writes that "the Farmers' Alliance is not a political party." Section 4 of Article V., however, reads as follows: "The Executive Committee shall not, except upon the direct authority of the State Alliance, given in annual or special meeting, take any part in State or national politics; or make, as such Executive Committee, any indorsement of any party or nomination of any man, for any State or national office, or otherwise commit the Alliance to the support of any political organization or individual. Provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the State Alliance, at any annual, or especial meeting, properly called, from placing a State ticket in the field, if in the judgment of two-thirds of those present the welfare of the farmers of this State requires such action, and nominations so made shall be by a majority vote. Nor shall it prevent the Executive Committee from aiding the election of legislative tickets, where the same have been placed in nomination by conventions called by any county alliance, or any legislative district alliance." The inference is that while the Alliance cannot support any other party nominations, it may nominate and urge the election of its own candidates, unless the sonstitution has since been changed.

THE HOME.

THE GLORIOUS DEATH OF MOSES.

Lord, 'tis an infinite delight
To see thy holy face,
To dwell whole ages in thy sight,
And feel thy vital rays.

This Gabriel knows, and sings thy name
With rapture on his tongue;
Moses, the saint, enjoys the same,
And heaven repeats the song.

Sweet was the journey to the sky
The wondrous prophet tried,
"Climb up the mount," says God, "and die;"
The prophet climbed and died.

Softly his fainting head he lay
Upon his Maker's breast,
His Maker kissed his soul away
And laid his flesh to rest.

In God's own arms he left the breath
That God's own Spirit gave;
His was the noblest road to death,
And his the sweetest grave.

—Isaac Watts.

WHAT HE WAS GOOD FOR.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

"There's that dustpan on the stairs again!" and Mrs. Caleb Dunning slid rapidly down the stairs, with the dustpan between her feet, a basket of crockery on one arm and a pan of fruit-cans on the other. Of course she made a noise; how could she do otherwise? All the near neighbors rushed to their doors under the impression that the strikers had come. She was not much hurt, but was overflowing with wrath as she picked herself up.

"It's that boy!" she cried, "that miserable, worthless scamp of a boy! Here, Silas—Silas Dunning!" she cried, "did you hear me fall down stairs?"

The boy did not reply, but removed his tattered straw-hat and stood respectfully before her. He was barefooted, although it was cold weather in April; his pantaloons were rolled up to his knees, and his coat was in tatters.

"What are you good for, Silas Dunning? You are good-for-nothing. You will never be good for anything. What did you leave that dustpan on the stairs for? Wanted to kill me, did you?"

The boy did not reply, but replaced his tattered hat upon his head, crowded his hands into the pockets of his ragged coat, and walked jauntily away, singing "Daisy Dean," at the top of his voice. He walked slowly along, musing bitterly over his aunt's cruel words. "I didn't leave the dustpan on the stairs," he said; "'twas Maude; but that is always the way; Auntie always blames me. I get nothing but blame since father and mother died. I believe I'll go a fishing;" and, suiting the action to the word, he started for the creek.

Now, the long-continued rains had swollen the creek so that it was like a torrent. "Oh dear!" he said, "how the waters do tumble along! Guess the fishes are all drownded out. Ho! what was that?" A sweet voice sounded across the water: "Silas Dunning!" "It's Mabel Clemmer!" cried Silas, dropping his pole.

If there was anything on earth that Silas loved, it was Mabel Clemmer. She was Judge Clemmer's daughter, but she had always been kind to Silas. He was sixteen, and she barely eleven, but she had championed him in school and elsewhere. She was a beautiful child, and Silas, notwithstanding his rags, was a noble-looking boy; and Mabel pitied him his hard lot. It was like a ray of sunshine, now, to see her standing on the other side of the creek.

"Hello, Mabel!" Silas cried; "want to come over here?" "Yes," said Mabel;" can't you help me over?" "Why don't you come round by the bridge?" "Can't," said Mabel; "there's a big load of hemlock bark on it. Can't you carry me over?" "I will," said Silas; and he waded fearlessly into the icy water.

He reached the bank, and lifting Mabel in his arms started to carry her over, but it was not such an easy task. "Oh, dear!" he said; "I cannot get over here. I must go farther down the stream; the stones are so slippery." But farther down the stream the water was deeper, and twice Silas was nearly swept off his feet.

He stopped at last, panting. "Mabel," he said "I shall have to put you in that tree for the present, and we must call for help. Who ever thought the water would be so deep?" "Papa said this morning that it was rising all the time," said Mabel. "It is the snow melting on the mountains."

The tree was a slender sapling that stood on a little knoll near the middle of the creek. Silas lifted Mabel to the nearest limb, which was about three feet above the water. "There," he said, "now you are safe for the present." "But what shall we do?" said Mabel. "We must call for help," said Silas; "the road is just over there, you know; we must keep watch and wait for some one to help us."

But the moments dragged on wearily, and help did not come. One old gentleman passed by in a sulky, and although they shouted with might and main, he just glanced round and passed on. "Don't leave me, Silas," said Mabel, clinging to the arm with which he steadied her on the tree. "My aunt says I am good for nothing; that I will never be good for anything," Silas said, a little bitterly. "But I think you are good for something. I think you are nice, and I like you," said Mabel. "And I like you," said Silas. "I think I could die for you," he said, looking up into the sweet face above him. "But I don't want you to die for me, Silas; I want you to live for me."

Half an hour passed by and help did not come. At last Silas took a cord from his pocket and with it tied Mabel to the tree. "What are you going to do, Silas?" "Tie you so you won't fall off. I must go for help." "Poor boy," she said, compassionately; "you are standing in the cold water all this time." Silas spoke suddenly: "Say, Mabel, did you ever hear of a man who died for the world?" "Who died to save the world?" said Mabel; "oh yes, I hear about him in Sunday-school. It was Jesus." "Do men ever die to save each other?" "I think they do, sometimes." "Mabel, I must go and get help, and maybe something will happen; If there should, will you remember that it was for your sake?" "Yes, Silas." "Can you sing? Sing 'Rock of Ages.'" Sweetly the child voice sounded across the water, until it seemed to die away in an echo among the distant hills.

"Oh dear," said Silas," how the water is rising; will help never come? Can you say a prayer?" Mabel bowed her head, and Silas could just distinguish the words: "Oh, God, help this poor boy; he is cold and tired, and we cannot get out of the water; help us, please, and bring us safe home. Amen." "That's it," said Silas; "bring us safe home!" He lifted his hands and drew the sweet face down and kissed it; then, turning resolutely away, with a groan of renunciation, he plunged into the seething waters.

A few moments afterwards, Mabel, looking over to the highway which ran a few rods south of the creek, saw a buggy approaching, and, oh joy! it was her father. "Oh, papa!" she cried;" come here and help me!" "Well, I declare," said Judge Clemmer, "if there isn't Mabel there in the creek, tied to a tree! What are you doing up there you little witch?" "Oh, papa, come and get me, and I will tell you all about it."

In a few moments she was safe on the shore, and her father had learned all. Soon a sympathetic crowd were searching for the brave boy. He was not found until late in the afternoon, when his body was discovered in a tiny cave, a few rods below the mill-dam. He was quite dead.

Well, of course there was a funeral, and everybody suddenly discovered that they had suffered a personal loss in the death of the lad. He had always been a good boy, they said; always ready to run on errands or to do a good turn; always bright and cheerful, with a kind word or a smile for everybody. The teacher who had mercilessly snubbed him, dismissed her school at noon the day before the funeral, and they dispersed in a body to the woods to search for flowers; and so well did they succeed that the coffin of the dead boy was nearly hidden under a pyramid of yellow flowering-currant and sweet-scented arbutus; and the preacher twisted and distorted the Scripture text, "Who gave himself a ransom," to meet the occasion, and the organ pealed and the choir wailed a suitable funeral dirge. But we venture to allege that the only real mourner in that assembly was Mabel Clemmer. Although a child, strange thoughts surged and burned in her soul. She recalled Silas' strange words: "Did men ever die for others?" and again and again the thought passed through her brain, "He died to save me! That's just what he did! He died to save me!" And the heart of the poor child ached like the heart of a woman.

Mabel did not forget. She grew to womanhood and became a missionary; and many times, in after-years, in her home in Sunrise Land, she told this story to the "dark-browed children of the sun," who gathered around her and listened with breathless interest to the pathetic tale of the heroic lad who gave his life to save hers; and she always closed the story with the words: "And the poor boy wondered, even to the last day of his life, what he was good for."

RUINED BY BAD READING.

Quite recently, at Danville, Ill., two young men, the oldest twenty-one, the other nineteen, were hung for the murder of a well-to-do farmer, whom they had waylaid with the purpose of robbing him. On the night of August 25th, these two youths, Harry Pate and Frank Stier with two other boys lay in wait by the roadside. When Mr. Helmick, the farmer, and his wife came by in their carriage, two of the boys sprang to the horses' heads, and the other two came up to the side of the carriage with revolvers demanding "your money or your life." Mr. Helmick said, "All right boys," but struck his horses sharply at the same time. As the horses sprang forward the boys shot, and Helmick fell over dead in the lap of his wife. Three more shots were fired, narrowly missing the wife, who, though wild with grief and fright, had presence of mind to gather up the reins and guide the horses as they plunged through the darkness homeward. The boys got no money. They were soon caught, and on Friday were hung by the neck until dead. On the scaffold they confessed their crime and attributed the ruin of their lives to the reading of flash books, the kind of books that are circulating by millions among our American boys, and greedily read by them.

From the confession made by one of them, we take the lollowing details:

"Pate had a great ambition to rob a bank, and they decided that they would take the Helmick money and go to Chicago. There they would buy fast horses, Winchester rifles, false beards and tools for cutting barb-wire fences, and then return to near Danville, and make a raid on Watson's Bank at Rossville or the Lyons, Alexander & Co., at Sidell. After robbing the bank, they expected by means of their wire-cutter to dash across the fields through barb-fences and escape."

Reader, do you recognize the stuff? Did you ever read one of the detective stories, Old Sleuth Library series, Youth's papers and such like? There it is to the letter.

Do you know what your boys are reading? Do you furnish them good reading? Is this matter worth your attention?—Apostolic Guide.

THE PRESENCE OF CHRIST.

I declare my entire faith that there is a presence of Christ, not to the body, but to the spirit which goes with it, and cherishes it, and inspires it, and enlightens it, and strengthens it, and communes with it, until there is an invisible union formed that amounts to a companionship more sweet and enduring than any companionship that can be known as existing between one human being and another. Dear friend, do you ask if such a thing is possible? You do not derive anything like the benefit from your faith that you might. God did not mean that you should be such a spiritual pauper. You are God's child, and the table of the Lord is spread abundantly for you. And yet you suffer hunger. There is indeed such a thing as an experience of "Christ in you the hope of glory." There is a fulfillment of this passage which leaves nothing to be desired. "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." Take comfort, poor stumbling one. You have been saying, "I do not know that I love Christ. I do not feel such a glowing love for him as I wish I did." I ask you, Do you think that you have the commandments of Christ, and that you keep them? If so, then you are doing that which, according to Christ's own declaration, consists in loving him. Take Christ's commandments, and put your whole soul into them, that you may keep them, and he will accept your obedience for love. He further declares, "He that loveth me shall be loved of my Father." Think what it is for God to love. There is more help for your soul in one moment's conviction that God, looking on your personality, says, "I love you," than in all ordinary ethical experience. And this conviction is for every one that desires it and will seek it. He also says of the man that loves him, "I will love him, and will manifest myself to him." Even so. This is the Word of God. It is yea and amen.—Selected.

THE HOLY SPIRIT AND CONSCIENCE.

The work of the Spirit on conscience is a threefold one. Through conscience the Spirit causes the light of God's holy law to shine into the heart. A room may have its curtains drawn, and even its shutters closed. This cannot prevent the lightning flash from time to time shining into the darkness. Conscience may be so sin-stained and seared that the strong man within dwells in perfect peace. When the lightning from Sinai flashes into the heart conscience wakes up, and is at once ready to admit and sustain the condemnation. Both the law and the Gospel, with their call to repentance and their conviction of sin, appeal to the conscience. It is through conscience that the Spirit likewise causes the light of mercy to shine. When the windows of a house are stained they need to be washed. "How much more shall the blood of Christ cleanse your conscience?" The whole aim of the precious blood of Christ is to reach the conscience, to silence its accusations, and cleanse it till it testify. Every stain is removed; the love of the Father streams in Christ in unclouded brightness into my soul. "A heart sprinkled from an evil conscience, having no more conscience of sin" (Heb. 9:14; 10:2–22) is meant to be the privilege of every believer. It becomes so when conscience learns to say amen to God's message of the power of Jesus' blood.

The conscience that has been cleansed in the blood must be kept clean by a walk in the obedience of faith, with the light of God's favor shining on it. To the promise of the indwelling Spirit, and his engagement to lead in all God's will, conscience must say its amen too, and testify that he does it.

The believer is called to walk in humble tenderness and watchfulness, lest in anything, even the least, conscience should accuse him for not having done what he knew to be right or done what was not of faith. He may be content with nothing less than Paul's joyful testimony. Our glorying is this: The testimony of our conscience, that in holiness and godly sincerity, by the grace of God, we behaved ourselves in the world.

Let us note these words well: "Our glorying is this, the testimony of our conscience." It is as the window is kept clean and bright by an abiding in the light that we can have fellowship with the Father and the Son, the love of heaven shining in unclouded, and our love rising up in childlike trustfulness.

"Beloved, if our heart condemn us not, we have boldness toward God . . . . because we keep his commandments, and do those things that are pleasing in his sight."—Rev. Andrew Murray.

A GOOD INDIAN.

An Indian chief ceded to the government a large tract of land, in return for which he was to receive a large supply of food. He went out and gathered in his Indians and they were all there by hundreds. The supplies were there and the Indians were there, but the agent of the government had not come. The Indians had only brought supplies that would keep them on their journey, knowing that they would get a lot when they got there. The first day passed, the commissioner had not come. The second day passed, and the commissioner had not come. The third day passed and still no commissioner. And so with the fourth and the fifth, and still the big man representing the government was to come. Then they took a fleet horse and went out to meet him. They reached him Saturday night and said, "You have broken faith with us. Hurry on and give us food, for our wives and children are starving." He said, "Wait and eat with me; to-morrow we will divide the food." "No," said the chief, "we will take the food to-night or we will not take it until Monday. Our missionaries have taught us that it is our duty to make all the preparations for the Sabbath on Saturday."

The Indians wanted the chief to go and take the food anyway. It was theirs and they had a right to it. But he would not do it; that was not the treaty, and he would not break his treaty with the government. And so you will notice that it is never the Indians who are the first to break treaties. Well, the commissioner expected the Indians to be out when he got there Sunday firing guns and waving flags, but they let him come in solitary grandeur. He sent for the chief to come and dine with him. "No," says the chief, "it is the Lord's day; I will not come. I will stay with my family." And the Indians would not even come for a council till Monday. I give you that as an illustration of the way the Canadian Christian Indians keep the Sabbath.—Dr. Young in Chautauqua address.

CALL OF THE CENTURY.

"Is there not an appointed time to man upon earth? are not his days also like the days of an hireling?"—Job. 7:1.

In less than a hundred years from to-day,
But few of us here will live to pray;
The voices that clamor for right 'gainst wrong
Will cease to be heard in prayer or song.

In less than a hundred years from this time,
Millions will die in every clime;
Friend and foe, the wicked and good,
Will toil no more for their daily food.

Ere the clock of the century strikes again,
The world will be done with millions of men;
"Go work," brother Christians; labor and pray,
For the time to labor is passing away.

TEMPERANCE.

DISEASES DUE TO DRINK.

Turning from the effects of alcoholism on the nervous system to its effect on the other organs, and bearing, of course, in mind that it is always difficult to determine whether this latter is direct or only secondary as a result of neurotic disease, we find numerous instances both of acute and chronic diseases of the mucous membrane of the pharynx, stomach and intestines. These are important, not only from their frequent occurrence, but especially for their bearing on the general alimentation. I believe most physicians will agree with me in the view that inflammation of the stomach and bowels in adults is almost invariably due to alcoholic poisoning.

But alcohol exerts its essential and most significant influence on the vital organs by being taken up in the circulation and thus brought into direct contact with their cellular tissue. We have no clearer evidence of the direct action of a poison in producing primary cell death than is afforded by the action of alcohol on the liver, producing liver cirrhosis. Typical liver cirrhosis was found in three per cent of all the male bodies examined at the Leipsic Pathological Institute.

But the organic changes which my own experience compels me to place in the first rank as denoting the most injurious effects of alcoholic indulgence are the diseases of the muscles of the heart and its nervous apparatus, the diseases of the arteries and of the kidneys.

But while it has long been known that delirium tremens, neurosis and cirrhose liver owe their existence to alcoholic poisoning, it is by no means generally recognized that chronic heart and kidney diseases are due to the same cause. And yet the practical significance of precisely this form of alcoholic poisoning, apart even from its frequency, is of the highest, from the fact that these diseases are induced not so much by the use of concentrated alcohol, but especially by heavy beer drinking. This habit of excessive beer drinking is very widely prevalent among the cultivated classes and claims its victims among men who regard the drinking of schnapps as an act of moral degradation. It is not only that the quantity of alcohol consumed by heavy beer drinkers is excessive, but the consumption of liquid involved in the habit is no less excessive and injurious. To this, too, must be added as hardly less prejudicial the consumption of an extra and undue amount of nutritive matter contained in the beer.

All these conditions tend to that disease which is rarely absent in steady beer drinkers. The prime anatomical change exhibits itself as hypertrophy of the muscles of the heart, especially of the left ventricle. This is the result of a continuous overtaxing of the heart's powers. The prime factor here is the excessive amount of water which before it can again be given off by the kidneys, skin and lungs must be taken up by the blood and maintained in motion by the heart. The excess of nutritive matter furnished by the beer contributes to the same result.

Kidney diseases as a result of alcoholism are still more frequent; and with wine and beer drinkers the extra labor imposed on the kidneys by excess of fluid renders them especially susceptible to the large influence of the accompanying alcohol.

Finally, there is another interesting group of diseases resulting from alcoholic action in disturbing and upsetting the chemical processes of assimilation. The leading types of diseases due to this cause are gout, diabetes and fatty degeneration of the heart, and while allowing that in many cases alcoholic action may be supplemented by contributory causes, I think it will be apparent that the sum of the evils properly ascribable to alcohol is such as to warn us physicians that here is a matter in which all our forces should be enlisted.—Dr. Adolph Strumpell.

SLAVES OF ALCOHOL.

The most common of all forms of intoxication is of course that due to alcohol, and the question of its treatment is most formidable. Alcohol affects the system in such a variety of ways, perverts the functions of so many organs, invades and corrodes so many tissues, that the physician is often puzzled as to what part of the organism needs treatment first. The poison produces chronic inflammation of the stomach; it gradually inflames the liver, and in fact strangles it like an iron hand; it injures the heart; it affects the kidneys; it does harm to the lungs; it produces neurasthenia, delirium tremens, insanity and epilepsy by its influence upon the nervous system; it attacks the spinal cord and causes pseudo ataxia.

Sometimes the physicians treat one of these conditions in a patient and sometimes many. But the worst condition is that of the vice or disease itself. He may treat and relieve to a certain extent the disorders just enumerated, but the habit offers terrible difficulties to overcome in order to conquer it. How shall the habit be cured? For many decades this complex question has commanded the attention not only of physicians, but of laymen, lawyers, clergymen and statesmen. Either the desire for alcohol must be got rid of or the alcohol itself must be made unattainable.

To accomplish the first, appeal has been made to the enfeebled will of the victim by lectures, pledges, hypnotic suggestions, religious influences and the like, often with considerable success. And drugs, too, have been lauded by physicians, and a multitude of secret nostrums by quacks to accomplish the same purpose, also with considerable success, though not so much through the merits of being an antidote to the impulse for drink as by virtue of the support by faith or suggestions given to the weak will of the victim.

On the other hand, to make alcohol unattainable, or at least to put it as far as possible out of reach, the law has been invoked to regulate liquor selling in general, to prevent its sale to drunkards, to imprison habitues or to commit inebriates to special institutions for a certain period of time.

While all of these means have, in individual instances, been productive of successful results, the facts remain that no drug has been found that is always equal to destroying the morbid craving, and the laws are inadequate as regards the regulation of the liquor traffic and the isolation of the drunkard from the contiguity of his ruling demon. —New York Sun.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. God's counsels revealed to Abraham.—v. 22. "But Abraham stood yet before the Lord." It is noticable that while he entertained three angels, only two went to Sodom. Many have thought that the third person was the angel of the covenant, the Lord himself, who, on the way, revealed to Abraham what he was about to do, and while the two angels went on toward Sodom, to execute his righteous judgments on that wicked city, graciously lingered while Abraham made intercession for its doomed inhabitants. God would not hide his purpose from Abraham because he was his friend, and through a constant habit of daily, loving communion, he had earned the right, speaking humanly, to know the mind of God, as in the same way we get the confidence of any earthly friend. The lives of eminent saints often show a wonderful insight into things hidden from the common mind, which can only be accounted for by their daily intimacy with the Lord. There was still another reason: "That he will command his children and his household after him, and they will keep the way of the Lord to do justice and judgment," that, in turn, the lesson might be communicated to others, even down to us, nearly 4,000 years after. "The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him;" but it differs entirely from the secret mysteries of ancient heathenism, or the so-called secrets of modern heathenism as communicated in the lodge-room, under oaths and penalties never to reveal them. The secrets of the Lord are to be made known to as many as will receive them.

2. Abraham's faith in God's justice.—vs. 23–26. "And Abraham drew near." This is the privilege of the Christian, to "draw near in full assurance of faith." Abraham takes his stand on the perfect justice of God. Will he destroy the righteous with the wicked, making no difference between them? "That be far from thee." We should refuse to entertain for a moment any thought or opinion which is derogatory to the honor of God, or to attribute to him qualities which would be sin in a human being. This rule would have spoiled many theological dogmas invented by men, or founded on a wrong interpretation of Scripture, and prevented many bitter religious controversies.

3. Abraham's humility.—vs. 27–30. Fifty righteous men would have saved Sodom, but Abraham seems to doubt, or perhaps receives some assurance, that even this number is not to be found there. He goes on to plead: "If there lack five of the fifty righteous, wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five?" He then takes off another five and says: "Peradventure there be forty found there;" and the same gracious answer is returned. We note here Abraham's humility. He did not presume on his intimate relations with Jehovah. In his own eyes he was "but dust and ashes." Presumption is never the result of living near to God. It comes from the opposite course of living too far away from him. The more we know of God, and the more closely he allows us to approach him, the more humble we shall become.

4. Abraham's persistent prayer.—vs. 30–33. "Oh, let not the Lord be angry." This was that godly fear which is always a part of true piety. Finally he reduces the number to ten. "Peradventure ten shall be found there." Even ten righteous persons would have saved Sodom. "And the Lord went his way....And Abraham returned unto his place." Abraham seems to have felt no inward assurance that warranted him in praying farther for Sodom. If ten righteous persons could not be found within her walls, then her situation must be indeed desperate. We note (1) That this is the first recorded prayer which we find in the Bible; but it is not a prayer for self. It is not even a prayer for friends or acquaintances. The people of Sodom were strangers to Abraham, but we see in him anticipated the New Testament rule, that every human being is our neighbor. (2) It was answered in the preservation of Lot and his family. Persistent prayer is always prevailing prayer. Our petitions are too often selfish. He that watereth shall be watered also himself, and the prayers that bring down blessings on others cannot fail to include ourselves in the grateful shower. (3) We can not always stay on the heights. We must return unto our place of daily duty, but it will be with a new light on those duties, which will transform our most ordinary tasks into the sacredness of direct service to God. They who have enjoyed such high and holy communion will not forget it. The remembrance will be always with them as a stimulus to fresh effort for the salvation of others, and an earnest of the time when they shall see him face to face. (4) Our lesson emphasizes the need that Christians should separate themselves from the world, in order to save the world. Ten persons who were wholly separated from the wickedness around them would have saved the sinners of Sodom. By mingling with the world we lose all our spiritual influence and risk the loss of our own souls. By separation we save both ourselves and others.

LITERATURE.

THE NATIONAL REFORM MOVEMENT: Its History and Principles. A Manual of Christian Civil Government. By David McAllister, D.D,. LL. D. A New and Enlarged Edition. One vol., pp. 313. Philadelphia: Aldine Press Co.

When this volume was first issued, several years ago, it was designed less for public instruction in the principles of the National Reform Association than as a hand-book for the use of the secretaries and other active workers in that institution. But as the demand for a wider distribution of it increased, the executive committee prepared a new and improved edition for general circulation. A note from Secretary Wylie informs us that the book has never before been presented to the notice of the public by press reviews; and as every lover of the Lord Jesus Christ and his kingdom is more or less interested in the work of the Association, this volume will admirably serve to acquaint them with the principles and reforms to which it is pledged, and the history of its rise and progress.

Readers of the Cynosure have, in the past, heard much of the National Reform Association, and are not ignorant of its purposes and character. It starts out on the basis that this ought to be a Christian nation, based on love and allegiance to the Lord Jesus Christ as the one true and only King to whom all homage is due, and that it is the bounden duty of every Christian to endorse, maintain and promulgate the principles of love, truth, and justice upon which his kingdom is founded. To this end it labors for the recognition of Almighty God and the Lord Jesus in the United States Constitution; for a closer individual observance of the Christian Sabbath; for the acknowledgement of Christ and his supremacy in all political platforms; for a universal "rest-day," which shall insure a cessation of all public service on the Christian Sabbath by order of the national government; for a uniform divorce law, based on Christian rule and practice; for the acknowledgment of our national and private obligations to the Lord Jesus Christ in Presidential and State Thanksgiving proclamations, and for the general adoption of all needful social and political reforms that tend to make us, as a people, wiser and better in all our ways.

No better exponent of these principles and designs could have been chosen to prepare this work than Rev. Dr. McAllister, and he has brought unstinted grace and wisdom into his work. Beginning with the origin and nature of the movement, which is replete with interest, he proceeds to elaborate its historical and documentary basis, together with its foundation in philosophy, Scripture and the law of self-defense. Objections to the movement are capably met, and its methods of work and the results already attained, with its gratifying prospects of success and final victory, constitute a series of instructive lessons.

Among the many reforms advocated by the Association is the discountenancing and suppression of all secret societies as enemies of our religious, social and political interests.

Not the least valuable portion of this volume is the Appendix, in which are printed the celebrated "Mayflower" compact of the Pilgrims, the old Plymouth Colony school-law, the Colonial articles of confederation, the Declaration of Independence, the Thanksgiving proclamation issued by the Continental Congress, the Articles of Confederation of the original States, the ordinance constructing and defining the Northwest Territory, the United States Constitution, Washington's Farewell Address, and half-a-dozen other State papers of unusual interest.

Copies of this work can be obtained from Rev. R. C. Wylie, Corresponding Secretary of the N. R. A., 37 Federal street, Allegheny, Pa. We do not know its price—probably $1.00.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

St. Nicholas for February is very attractive. Recollections of the Wild Life—Games and Sports, by Dr. Chas. A. Eastman; Tom Sawyer Abroad, by Mark Twain, and Toinette's Philip, by Mrs. Jamieson, are continued with their usual interest. Other papers of equal excellence are Tiger! Tiger! by Rudyard Kipling; Towed by an Iceberg, by J. O. Davidson; A Skater's Strategem, by Kate W. Hamilton; Benjamin Franklin (full of historic novelty), by Brander Matthews; Good Neighbors, by Tudor Jenks; The Quadrupeds of North America—The Monkeys, by Wm. T. Hornaday; Babette, by Mary A. Winston, and The Dead-Letter Office—always a charming subject, by Pattie Lyle Collins. These and numerous verses and many illustrations, with the usual departments for the little folks, will secure delighted readers. Published by the Century Co., Union Square, New York City. 25 cents.

McClure's Magazine for the current month will attract attention by its variety and novel contents. The frontispiece is a portrait of Robert Louis Stevenson. The Real Conversation—fourth of the series—is between James Whitcomb Riley and Hamlin Garland, detailing the early life and literary career of the good Hoosier poet; "Human Documents"—Portraits of Distinguished People (at different periods of their lives) present Robert Louis Stevenson, Hamlin Garland and Philip D. Armour; Arthur Warren also contributes a separate life sketch of Mr. Armour, with illustrations and portraits. Robert L. Stevenson and Lloyd Osbourne contribute the first chapters of a new serial—The Ebb Tide—which promises well. Other articles are: The Observatory on Top of Mt. Blanc, by Ida M. Tarbell; Nervousness: The National Disease of America, by Edward Wakefield; Short Stories by Mrs. E. V. Wilson and Robert Barr; Several poems, etc. Published by S. S. McClure, (Ltd), 743 Broadway, New York City. Price, 15 cents.

The Preacher's Magazine for February is as usual most complete and helpful to the pastor, teacher, and Bible student. The leading sermon of this number is by Joseph Parker, and he entitles it Sons of Eli, Yet Sons ot Belial, The Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, who so ably edits the magazine, contributes another chapter on Moses: His Life and its Lessons, and takes up From Sinai to the Waters of Meribah. Dr. Robert A. Watson concludes in this number his papers on The Apostolic Churches: Their Doctrine and Fellowship. Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler furnishes his address on the Sunday Secular Newspaper, and Dr. D. A. Long a funeral address which he recently delivered. The Homiletics are excellent. Among the contributors we notice Dr. Alexandar Maclaren, Revs. J. Reid Howatt, Arthur E. Gregory, John Edwards, and several other distinguished divines. Rev. A. F. W. Ingraham furnishes a readable paper entitled Why do We Call the Bible Inspired? Among the other Departments of this magazine are Notes on the International Sunday-school Lessons, Outline Addresses on the Golden Texts, and Notes and Illustrations. The magazine is published by Wilbur B. Ketcham, 2 Cooper Union, New York. Price, 15 cents.

NOTES.

The Century for February contains an article by Mr. John G. Nicolay, President Lincoln's private secretary, on the Gettysburg Address, accompanied by a facsimile of the original manuscript, there printed for the first time. This article will probably settle various disputed points about the writing, delivery, and correct text of this famous address.

The "Advance Almanac for 1894 and Manual of Congregationalism," published by the Advance, 125 Franklin street, Chicago, in pocket-size, is a convenience, not only for members of that denomination, but for all others who would capably understand what it is doing and its status in the United States. The information which it contains is carefully collated, and embraces a wide range of topics, statistics and valuable suggestions. Price, by mail, 5 cents, or $1.25 per hundred.

Our old friend, Josiah W. Leeds, of Philadelphia, has issued, in tract form, "The Common Weal vs. The News-Stand," reprinted from the Christian Statesman. It is a stirring blast against the publication of vicious literature, "detective," "wild sport," and "blood-and-thunder" books and story papers for the young. Detective Pinkerton says: "The recent epidemic of train-robbers is largely due, in my opinion, to the reading of yellow-covered novels." Other crimes may also be traced to this pernicious literature. Evidence in this direction is abundant and condemnatory of the trash with which the press overflows. Mr. Leeds, likewise, suggests some wholesome remedies for this class of immorality.

Duncan's Masonic Ritual and Monitor. Profusely illustrated with explanatory engravings, and containing the ritual and work of the order for the seven degrees, including the Royal Arch. Though extensively used as an Instruction Book and one of the best in the market it is not as accurate as "Freemasonry Illustrated," the first book on catalogue. Price in cloth, $2 50.

Richardson's Monitor of Freemasonry. Containing the ceremonies of Lodges, Chapters, Encampments, etc. Illustrated. Although extensively used in conferring the higher degrees, it is not only very incomplete but inaccurate especially as regards the first seven degrees, and as to the higher degrees it gives but a description and general idea of the degrees rather than the full ritual. Price in cloth, $1.25; Paper covers, 75c.

Look to the East. A Ritual of the first three Masonic Degrees by Ralph Lester. Price in cloth $2.00. Notwithstanding the high price this book is very inferior in every way to Freemasonry Illustrated or The Handbook of Freemasonry at a quarter the price.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.
BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' said 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer' !"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

HOME AND HEALTH.

THE FACE AS AN INDEX TO DISEASE.

Incomplete closure of the eyelids, rendering the whites of the eyes visible during sleep, is a symptom in all acute and chronic diseases of a severe type; it is also to be observed when rest is rendered unsound by pain, wherever seated. Twitching of the eyelids, associated with the oscillation of the eyeballs, or squinting, heralds the visit of convulsions. Widening of the orifices of the nose, with movements of the nostrils to and fro, points to embarrassed breathing, from disease of the lungs of the pleural investment. Contraction of the brows indicates pain in the head; sharpness of the nostrils, pain in the chest; and a drawn upper lip, pain in the abdomen. To make a general rule, it may be stated that the upper third of the face is altered in expression in affections of the brain; the middle third, in disease of the chest; and the lower third, in diseases of the organs contained in the abdominal cavity.—Hygiene of the Nursery.

A FEW EYE DONT'S.

Don't allow a cold wind to strike the eyes.

Don't try to do eye work with the light shining in the face.

Don't go directly from a warm room into a cold, raw atmosphere.

Don't open the eyes under water in bathing, especially in salt water.

Don't have colored shades on the lamps; use white or ground glass.

Don't let any strong light, like that from electricity, shine directly into the eyes.

NOTES.

"Keep in good spirits. Don't let despondency of any kind ever settle about your plans. Hopefulness is half the battle. Discouragement is nine-tenths of defeat. Hope and a merry heart are more invigorating than the apothecary's tonic."

Shallow pans of water set about the house after painting will absorb the smell of paint.

Poorly ventilated kitchens make poor cooks, by destroying the sense of taste and smell.

Hall's Hair Renewer renders the hair lustrous and silken, gives it an even color, and enables women to put it up in a great variety of styles.

Talks to Sunday-School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Telescope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,
BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Triunity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record:

"This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it here prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by perusing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal this book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polemical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FARM NOTES.

POULTRY PICKINGS.

A young hen lays a larger litter than the old hen. It is probable that the first and second years of a hen's life are the most productive of eggs. How unprofitable then to kill off the young fowls and leave the aged ones.

Do not give all the fruit and vegetable parings to the pigs; let the poultry have a share.

Is the house overcrowded? Thin out the poorer specimens and give the others more room. The flock will pay better.

Wood ashes, besides setting free the ammonia of the droppings, bleaches the shanks of the fowls and should not be emptied in the poultry house.

A steel trap properly set will catch the 'possum that kills the chickens. Set it inside of the house in front of the opening where the varmint enters, protecting it from the fowls by boards or a wire screen.

If there are no outer sheds with a sunny exposure for the flock to frequent they had better be confined to the house. Wading in slush and standing in a winter wind do not promote health nor induce laying.

Cooked food fed warm is very much more economical and profitable than raw food. The grains may be cooked in quantity and fed cold, and they will keep for weeks in cold weather. Laying hens ought to enjoy a steaming mash containing some meat scraps every morning. Thin, watery food can't be expected to supply material for eggs. Milk is excellent, and here is another place where winter dairying pays.

An experienced poultry-raiser says that no better use can be made of wheat chaff than to use it as a litter in the poultry-houses, in which the hens can scratch and exercise. If a gill of millet seed be scattered in the chaff the hens will work and hunt for the small seeds industriously until every one is found, and as the seeds are so very small the hens will be more earnest and diligent, the seeds also being somewhat of a luxury. The chaff will also assist in keeping the floor dry, thus adding to the warmth and comfort of the poultry-house during periods of cold or damp weather.

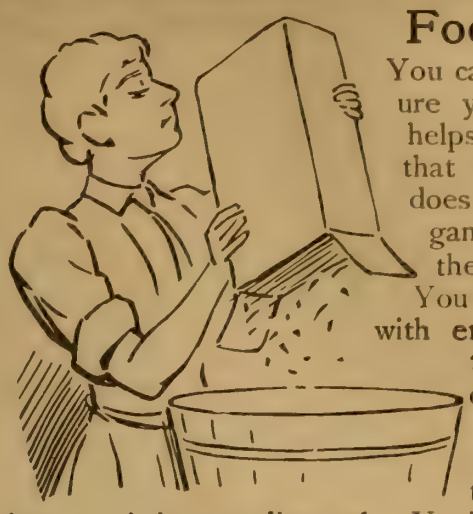
Foolish Woman!



You can't spare the time to measure your Pearline? Well, that helps us, but it's lucky for you that an overdose of Pearline does no harm. It's only extravagance. Beware of a dose of the imitations.

You can get just as good work with enough Pearline as with too much. Use it as it ought to be used, and don't waste it, and you can't think that it's expensive. To get the best results from Pearline, use it just as directed. You'll save more of everything than with anything else. If your grocer sends you an imitation, return it, please.

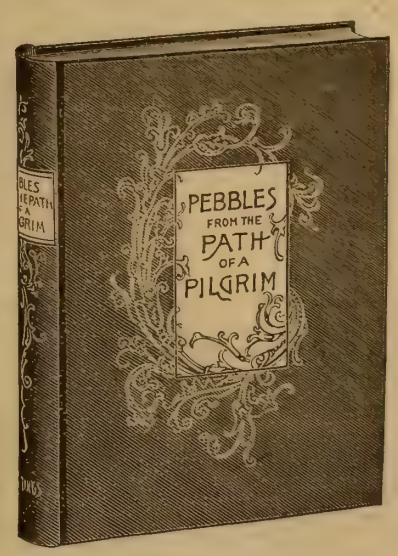
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

Modern Ideas of Evolution.

As related to Revelation and Science. By Sir William Dawson, L. L. D., F. R. S., etc. 12 mo, cloth, $1.50.

In popular style, a testing by scientific facts and principles, the validity of that multiform and brilliant philosophy of the universe, which has taken so deep a hold of the science and literature of our times.

The New World of Central Africa

By Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness; with a history of the first Christian mission on the Congo. Maps, Portraits and numerous engravings. 537 pages, 12 mo, $2.00.

This comprehensive volume is as fascinating as the most entertaining romance. Its vivid portrayal of the dark side of African history makes one's blood tingle, while its earnest appeals create an inspiring sympathy with the effort to evangelize its teeming millions.

"It is a little book which hundreds of devout hearts will enjoy."—Congregationalist.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches with an earnestness born of conviction.

Is Different from Others.

It is intended to aid the planter in selecting the Seeds best adapted for his needs and conditions and in getting from them the best possible results. It is not, therefore, highly colored in either sense; and we have taken great care that nothing worthless be put in, or nothing worthy be left out. We invite a trial of our Seeds. We know them because we grow them. Every planter of Vegetables or Flowers ought to know about our three warrants; our cash discounts; and our gift of agricultural papers to purchasers of our Seeds. All of these are explained in the Catalogue, a copy of which can be yours for the asking.

PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL ANTI-SECRECY MEETING.

To the Friends of the Cause of Anti-secrecy in Pennsylvania:—You are requested to assemble in the First United Presbyterian church, corner of Broad and Lombard streets, in the city of Philadelphia, on Monday and Tuesday, February 26 and 27, to hear reports and discuss matters that pertain to the Master's cause as they stand related to the National Christian Association and its work.

The opening session will be on Monday, February 26, at 7:30 P. M.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard, Field Secretary, will arrange and report program, with the advice of friends in Philadelphia.

Perils are imminent—the times auspicious. Let prayer be made for the presence and blessing of the Master of assemblies. Let there be a full rally of godly, praying people, male and female. Wise men will be glad to confer and know what "Israel ought to do" to turn back the tide of this flood which the dragon has sent out to destroy the church and the nation.

Reformers should be aroused!

Statesmen should be warned!

Victims should be saved from this all-desolating flood!

Let this convention inaugurate a new era of activity, zeal and success.

S. COLLINS, Pres.
J. S. T. MILLIGAN, Cor. Sec'y.
Beaver, Pa., Jan. 12, 1894.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard's letter, on page five of this issue, deserves particular attention for the encouragement which it gives of a successful convention at Philadelphia on the 26th and 27th inst. Those who intend to be present should at once write to him, in order to secure entertainment. The invitation to attend is cordial and general. The program, on page nine of this paper, has received some important additions since last week, and is now very attractive. Let all go who can.

The lower house of Congress, after five days of earnest debate, last week adopted resolutions endorsing the action of President Cleveland in the Hawaiian affair, and censuring Minister Stevens. The vote stood 177 to 75, and is considered a complete vindication of the President's course. The annexation of Hawaii, and governmental intervention in the affairs of its people, are also opposed by the resolutions.

Authorities at Washington decided, not long ago that Judge Long's pension must be paid to him, although his official salary is $7.000 a year. His pension was opposed because he is not sufficiently disabled to prevent his obtaining a living. Now Commissioner Lochren still asserts that the Judge's pension certificate was illegally issued. The questions at issue will interest pensioners and pension-seekers.

Anarchism is rife in the Pennsylvania coal mines, and is causing rioting and distrust. Not less than one hundred families in that region, it is reported, avow the teaching of anarchy and do not seek to disguise it. Their inspiration is drawn from Lucifer, the organ of their principles, printed at Madison, Wis., by a renegade Catholic, Michael Byron, under whose influence their reformation seems well-nigh impossible.

The church of Christ is built upon his teachings and the revelation of the Scriptures, enlightened by the Holy Spirit. The secret fraternity of Masonry is only a perpetuation of pagan mysteries and traditions of men. No wonder that Mackey tells us that "Freemasonry is not Christianity." The fact is self-evident as soon as the light of Gospel truth shines into the Masonic heart; and the lodge is henceforth cast to the caves of the bats and owls as something hideous in the new light which the hitherto deluded seeker after light has never been able to find at the Masonic altar. What men need is more of divine revelation, through God's Word and Holy Spirit, and less of human theology gathered from secular books and teachers.

In the United States Senate, on Wednesday of last week, the bill repealing the Federal election laws was passed by a vote of 38 to 29. The bill was passed in the House last October, and will now, unless vetoed by the President, become a law. It simply repeals all statutes relating to the appointment and duties of supervisors of election and special deputy marshals provided for in the national election law of 1870. The original statute was a Republican measure designed to protect Negroes and other voters against abuses at the polls, to secure honest elections, and maintain peace. Its repeal was demanded by the Democrats, and mainly carried by their influence. It remains to be seen whether the action of Congress has been wise or otherwise.

Among the peculiarities of the Coughlin murder trial, last week, was the testimony given by Policeman Whalen, in which he stated, on cross-examination, that he did not tell his superior officers that he belonged to the same secret society (presumably the Clan-na-Gael) as the prisoner. He also testified that had he been asked by his superior officers as to his connection with that fraternity, he would have denied it. The careful student of the lodge finds in this witness a fresh example of the principle that actuates and governs the generality of secret oath-bound societies—the destruction of private judgment, truthfulness and manhood by strict allegiance to the lodge-power. Many such instances have been exposed, yet time and again we are told by the advocates of the lodge that there is nothing in such allegiance that is wrong or that interferes with a member's rights and privileges as a good citizen, husband, father and church-member. In Whalen's case it indicates a disposition to screen his knowledge of the prisoner's guilt, and its effect is to throw a reasonable doubt upon the whole of his evidence in the case.

Referring to the situation in Mexico, an esteemed correspondent judiciously writes: "It is possible, perhaps, that Freemasonry ought to share with Rome, to some extent, the blame of the low standard of morals and education in Mexico. The men—at least those of the more intelligent class—are in the Masonic lodge, drinking in infidelity; the women are in the churches, priest-led into depths of darkest superstition. What can be expected of a country thus doubly cursed? And where may we Americans find ourselves, if we do not awake in time?" In this connection all true reformers have need to ask for that spirit of perfect fearlessness of man which will win the victory for Christ and his truth on this great spiritual battlefield, where our work lies before us.

In the course of an article on "Catholics aud the Public Schools," the Christian Conservator makes this excellent plea against the secret, oath-bound societies which are engaged in warfare upon the Roman Catholic church:

> We have for some time been inclined to believe that the recent outcry against the Catholics as seeking by secret means to undermine and overthrow our public schools and other public institutions, is largely due to prejudice and efforts made by designing persons and organizations for the purpose of securing to themselves public favor and advantage. When Satan, in the form of a secret lodge, begins to cast out Satan, in the form of Romanism, it is wise for good people to be wary lest he effect an entrance some place else where they are not expecting it. It is our deliberate judgment that we are in vastly more danger to-day from the secret lodge system in this country than from Romanism, and while we should watch with a jealous eye all encroachments by the Roman hierarchy, we should be doubly on our diligence lest the wily methods of the lodge divert our attention from their covert efforts in the same direction.

The uncertainty of partisan politics as a factor in any great national movement finds an apt illustration in the endeavor to establish Home Rule in Ireland. Recent news from Great Britain states that "John Redmond, Tinothy Harrington and Joseph Kenney, leaders of the Parnellite section of the Irish Parliamentary party, have issued a manifesto declaring that the Liberal government's rule in Ireland is a confessed failure. It does not, the manifesto adds, differ from Tory government. It has been marked by secret inquiries, evictions, and jury packing. Home Rule, it says, has been pushed aside, and it is therefore, necessary to restore Ireland to her old position of 'blocking the way.'" On the other hand, Mr. Gladstone, the leader of the English Liberals, is credited with saying, in substance, that he will not resign his ministry, and that he will make the House of Lords sensible of his power.

OUR NATIONAL JUDGMENTS.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

Joseph Cook, in the first Monday Lecture, on the 19th of January, discussed the unemployed. He gave as one cause of our present distress the fact that our lands are now occupied and there is no longer room for immigrants. Europe has a congested population, because Australia and other territories which received their surplus are filled. We may now expect a frequent recurrence of this experience. Another cause was the fear that the tariff would be disturbed. Money was kept locked up, and factories were shut. Still another cause was the liquor traffic. Out of this grew thriftlessness. Franklin used to say that an empty bag would not stand. Let our laborers become property-holders. And another cause still was over-production. It is sometimes called under-consumption. The market is glutted. And with abundant harvests and treasuries full of money, there is stagnation in business and suffering among workers. But all this fails to reach the real cause.

The hand of God has touched our nation and "quickly was our prosperous state turned into misery." Israel turned aside from Jehovah their King and worshiped idols. A great "dearth" was sent. Jeremiah assured them that this was the hand of God. But they turned a deaf ear to his warning. The Chaldeans invaded their land and carried many captive to Babylon. The prophet warned those who were left behind not to be high-minded, but fear. They were, notwithstanding, self-willed and rebellious. And, again, the Chaldeans came and burned up their cities and carried the people into bondage. Contemplating this, the prophet exclaimed: "O Lord, I know that the way of a man is not in himself; it is not in him that walketh to direct his steps." When men keep God's law, he reckons them as co-workers with himself, and blesses the work of their hands. When they resist his will, he overules their doings for the accomplishment of his purposes, but brings upon the wicked the fruit of their doings. "Man's goings are of the Lord; how can a man, then, understand his own way?" After the flood men said: Let us build a tower, lest we be scattered abroad. But that tower was the occasion of bringing about what they sought to avoid. Joseph's brethren sold him into Egypt, saying: "Let us see what will become of his dreams!" But this was the divinely appointed way of bringing Joseph to the throne and fulfilling the prophecies of his dreams.

Pharaoh said: "Come, let us deal wisely." But his oppressions brought God's favor in their increase and made the people willing to leave Egypt and follow Moses to the land of promise. It is an old saying: "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." We read "that God hardened Pharaoh's heart." He withdrew his grace and left him to his own heart. And he drove furiously into the Red Sea. The Jews were murderers in condemning Christ and delivering him to the Gentiles "to mock and scourge and crucify." But God used them to accomplish his will. "Him being delivered by the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God, ye have taken, and with wicked hands have crucified and slain." Solomon said: "A man's heart deviseth his own way, but the Lord directeth his steps." Physicians apply leeches to their patients. The object of the leech is to fill itself with blood. But the physician uses the bloodthirsty creature to remove the poisonous fluid from the veins of the sick man. God used Assyria as his rod with which to chasten his people. When the folly had been driven from the heart of his child, he broke the rod. It is an old proverb that "man proposes, but God disposes." Napoleon said that he would reverse that. He marched into Russia with 300,000 men. Presently he came back with 30,000. His army perished in the snows. His downfall was prepared by his own folly. The Southern slaveholders, before the war, demanded the privilege of carrying slavery into the Territories. This the North would not permit. With this pretext, the South seceded, and declared war. The result was the overthrow of the accursed system of slavery, while both North and South suffered for their participation in this great crime.

More than a century ago this nation adopted as its supreme law a secular Constitution. Under its influence we are becoming a secularized people, destitute of the sense of moral responsibility and accountability. Selfishness and greed are eating at the heart of our nation. Capitalists accumulate colossal fortunes, with a heartless disregard to the rights of men or the glory of God. Laborers combine and strike, without reference to the interests of their employers, their families or society, and in utter disregard of the law of God. Men form secret, oath-bound lodges, which consume the time and means belonging to the home and the church, and set at naught the authority and law of God. The voting society has become so frivolous and so destitute of a sense of obligation, that one-tenth of the votes are sold to the highest bidder; and for the sake of a change the great majority will vote into power principles that jeopardize their own interests.

If this distress brings us to ourselves, we will put away our folly. If we humble ourselves under the mighty hand of God, he will lift us up. If we fall down before our New Testament Joseph, he will open his store-houses and satisfy our every want. If we honor the King, he will bless us with the blessings of heaven above and of the earth beneath. Let the liquor traffic be abolished, let railroad trains, the U. S. mail, and Sunday newspapers, be discontinued on Sabbath, let all secret oath-bound societies be prohibited, and let our nation acknowledge Christ as the Ruler of nations, and his law as supreme in national affairs, and at once prosperity will return and increase; our churches will be filled with devout worshipers, and all will say: "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

WAR, AS IT AFFECTS THE HUMANE IMPULSE.

BY REV. H. H. HINMAN.

One of the marked characteristics of the nineteenth century is the rapid development of the humane principle. This is manifest in the multiplication of hospitals for the care of the sick and the insane, and in institutions for the education of the blind, the deaf mutes and the idiotic. It is seen in the reforms in the management of prisons, in the mitigation of penalties and general abolition of public executions. It shows itself in societies and plans for the relief of helpless poverty, for the protection of children, and in laws to punish cruelty to animals. Perhaps its most marked characteristic is seen in the abolition of the slave-trade and of slavery throughout Christendom, and the wide-spread concern as to its existence seen amongst the most barbarous nations. Doubtless there has been a higher development in other virtues. It may be that men are more honest, truthful and continent than a century ago; yet in nothing has there been the growth that we see in human sympathy. Whenever the appeal has been made, whether it came from the famine-stricken peasantry of Ireland or from the suffering subjects of the Russian Czar, it has met the same earnest and cheerful response with which the wants of a burned Chicago and a plague-stricken Memphis were also supplied. It is safe to say that such manifestations of human kindness, regardless of race or nationality, have been unparalleled in the history of the world.

That these kindlier impulses of human nature have been so long kept in abeyance—that such cruelties as the torture of prisoners and the burning of men and women whose sole offense was an honest difference of opinion, should have been so long tolerated in so-called Christian nations, was doubtless owing to the sad perversions of Christianity, and that war, which is in direct opposition not ouly to the teachings of our Lord and his apostles, but to the example of the entire primitive church, had come to be regarded as in harmony with the rules of the church and as a necessary incident of all civil government. Of late years there have arisen a large number of economic, as well as moral, considerations why war should be avoided, and for the last half of the century it has been less frequent. The reign of peace, though partial and interrupted, has been more general than in any former period in the history of the world, and, as a result, the humane principle has had an opportunity to be manifested. The following, from "Civilization, An Historical Review, by Chas. Morris," illustrates the unchanging influences of war, and is a strong reason for the maintenance of domestic and international peace:

"The duty of human sympathy, which in its nature seems to be at the foundation of moral usage, has lagged behind the other social virtues in its development. There must be some cause for this strange fact, and probably we may find this cause in the increasing prevalence of war.

"Outbreaks have been fierce and frequent, in which the utmost slaughter of opponents has been considered a praiseworthy act. Slaughter in war has been looked upon as no more sinful than slaughter in the chase, and wanton cruelties have been performed with the same callousness with which the ardent vivisectionist may grow to display towards the sufferings of the lower animals. Such undoubtedly is one prominent cause of the long reign of inhumanity.

"The massacres performed by the Roman armies, even the hundreds of thousands of barbarians slain by the highly cultivated Cæsar, apparently did not arouse in their minds the sentiment of sinfulness or criminality. In all these cases the victims were foes, and the prevalent theory of war hindered the growth of any feeling of humanity as applied to enemies. As the Romans felt that it was a virtue to destroy the enemies of their nation, so the Inquisitors believed that they were serving the cause of virtue by destroying the enemies of God.

"This theory and practice, as applied to all foreign tribes, unquestionably had a brutalizing effect upon all mankind, and long hindered the growth of the sentiment of humanity. The virtues that could be confined in their exercise to the members of a single group, such as truthfulness, honesty, continence, etc., met with no special check to their growth and either developed naturally or were practiced in response to the teachings of some religious reformer. But the sentiment of humanity, or the dogma 'thou shalt not kill,' met with a special check in the practice of war, which could not but reflect a brutalizing effect upon the whole people concerned, and tend to make them callous to human suffering in any shape or of any persons. . . . . The fact remains that every war exerts a brutalizing influence, not only upon the armies, but upon the nations engaged in it, and that the growth of the sentiment of humanity has been greatly retarded by the frequency and barbarity of the wars of the past centuries." (Pp. 430–432.)

REMINISCENCES OF THURLOW WEED.

"What part of your life do you look back to with most satisfaction?" I asked.

"To my persistent refusal of office," he answered quickly, "and to that"—and he pointed to an old brown document, framed, hanging on the wall, which, on examination, proved to be a government warrant for 160 acres of land for his services as a soldier in the war of 1812.

Observing that he had not located his warrant, and that it was still a sight draft for 160 acres of wild land, I asked him why he didn't use it.

"Oh! I don't want to bother with it," he said. "I'll put it in my will."

"But you said you had held office?" I reminded him.

"Oh, yes; I let the boys send me to the Legislature when I was a journeyman printer, fifty-five years ago. But I never had a thirst for office. A great many offices have been within my reach. Perhaps I am the only man who ever declined three first-class foreign missions, offered by three Presidents—Taylor, Fillmore and Lincoln."

"They say you have been Governor a good deal?" I suggested.

The old gentleman laughed heartily.

"Yes, that's what they say; but I was never elected to that office anyhow, and never drew a cent of salary. Yes," he added, after a pause, "of several Governors I have been the confidential friend, and perhaps I may say adviser."

"You may, indeed," I assented. "No other American has ever held such influential relations with high officials."

"And the oddest of it is," said he, eagerly, rising and walking the room, as if to walk off superfluous energy, "that I have been a confidential friend of at least two Democratic governors when I was a leading Whig. The first was Silas Wright."

"And they took your advice?" I asked.

"Yes, very often. When Marcy was Governor, he took me intimately into his confidence and his counsels; and, when he was Buchanan's Secretary of State, I occupied the same relation to him."

"You are so old, and have been so active, that you seem to have been a part of almost everything that has happened in this country," I said.

"Up there, somewhere," he answered, pointing indefinitely toward the wall, "is a silhouette of the first railroad in this country, and the first train of cars running between Albany and Schenectady." He paused and found it,—the black line of coaches drawn by a queer-looking iron-horse, with copies of which most people are familiar. "About there—that's me," said he, putting his finger on one of the stove-pipe hats in the rear coach.

"May I ask, What is the greatest misfortune that ever happened to you?"

"The greatest distress I ever suffered?" he inquired. "Oh! you must know what that was. Cruel, cruel! The vilest slander that ever was framed,—that I was a monster of brutality; and had mutilated a corpse, for the purpose of helping the fortunes of a party."

"I don't exactly remember what you mean," I said.

"Why, Morgan! Morgan!" he exclaimed, and his face assumed a pained expression. "I suffered untold distress, and was more or less under ban, for twenty-five years. Old acquaintances avoided me; even my family was made to feel the disgrace, as if I were a felon. It was cruel!"

"How was it," I said. "Or, perhaps you prefer not to talk about it?"

"I have no objection. It's an old story now, and belongs to the past. I was living at Rochester at the time Morgan, who had exposed Masonry, was missing. It was believed that he had been drowned, by members of the order, in Lake Ontario. A body was found which answered the description of his. It was exhibited in public, and was recognized as being him by his family and friends. It was buried by them. Afterward, it was claimed by the friends of another man, disinterred, and another inquest held. There was great excitement over the murder of Morgan, and I was prominent as an Anti-mason. When this last inquest was pending, the lawyer engaged by the Masons said to me, one day: 'What are you going to do for a Morgan now?' 'This man is a good enough Morgan,' I retorted, 'till you produce the man that was killed.' He went off and reported that I said the deceased was a good enough Morgan till after election. This lie was first published by Henry O'Reilly, editor of the Rochester Daily Advertiser; and it made such an excitement that he stuck to it and elaborated it. Finally, the lie took this form, that I had pulled out the beard, cut the hair, and otherwise defaced or mutilated the features of the Ontario corpse, so as to make them resemble Morgan! This was in the winter of 1826-27."

"Did people believe such a thing?"

"Yes, a good many did. It was a thing I could not disprove to their satisfaction. I was abhorred by tens of thousands. Old acquaintances cut me. I was pointed at on the street. Strangers would look askance at me. I saw them. Friends gave me the cold shoulder. I received threatening anonymous letters. I was made to feel everywhere and every hour that I was a marked man. And my poor family, sir," said he, lifting his hand with a pathetic gesture, "were made to feel the cruel thrusts in ways I cannot mention."

"How long did this ostracism last?"

"Fifteen or twenty years actively, and in some directions a much longer time."

"It seems strange that injustice should thrive so," said I.

"Well, it did thrive. O'Reilly became rich, and that lie was the foundation of his fortune. I drifted to Albany, and at last lived the shocking calumny down. Finally, O'Reilly, who might have been worth millions if he had stuck to the telegraphs, which he manipulated at first, speculated in other things and lost money. He kept losing. He lost everything he had at last."

"Were you glad?"

"I was grateful that the Lord did't allow such villainy to thrive forever," the old gentleman confessed; "and then I felt sorry for him."

"Where is he now,—dead?"

"Oh, no," said he; "O'Reilly is alive enough. Four years ago he wrote me a letter, saying that he was penniless, and asking me to send him one hundred dollars."

"Well, what did you do?"

"I sent it to him."

"You did?"

"Certainly, I did. And a few weeks later he wrote me a very grateful letter, which wound up by saying that he was completely out of money and out of business, and he didn't know what in the world he should do to keep alive if I didn't get him a place in the New York Custom House."

"Is it possible?"

"Yes."

"What did you do?"

"I went and reflected on how much pain he had caused me through a quarter of a century; on the grief and distress my family had suffered on his account; on the mortification and humiliation he had heaped upon my party and my friends; and then—then I went down and got him a place in the Custom House."

"You did?"

"I did."

"Where is he now?"

"In the Custom House, unless he has left since I heard from there. I believe he is there yet."

"Well, Mr. Weed, that beats all the revenges I ever heard of. Mr. Weed, you have put thousands of men in office; have you met with grateful returns of your friendly services?"

"Oh, yes, generally. Generous gratitude has been the rule!"

"I have heard," I said, "that to do a service for a man is the way to make him an enemy."

"That is not my observation," he answered.

"Then you believe in human nature and friendships after all these years of sharp party warfare and personal hostilities?"

"Oh heavens, yes!" exclaimed the old gentleman, "my life has been full of delightful friendships. The poet who said friendship was but a name didn't deserve to have a friend. Notwithstanding all the setbacks, I have found the world full of sunshine, generosity, good deeds, gratitude, self-denial, for the benefit of others. Heavens! yes! I do believe in human nature and the general excellence of men."

Here Mr. Weed called his servant, and had his now cold cup of tea changed for a hot one, while I withdrew, leaving him to finish his repast.—Selected.

MODERN JESUITISM.

Graf Paul Von Hoensbroech, whose paper "My Defection from the Order of the Jesuits," created such a sensation in Germany, has recently written another article entitled "Modern Jesuitism." The Kirchlicher Correspondent, Berlin, regards the latest contribution of great value; and points out the fact that when the Protestants or old Catholics make public the misdeeds of the Jesuits, the defenders of Jesuitism answer: "You talk of things that happened long ago, and of things you do not understand." But here is a man who certainly knows what he is writing about. He speaks of the things he has experienced, and answers fully the arguments of the most distinguished Jesuit writers, such as von Hammerstein, Cathrein, and Gury.

Hoensbroech throws a strong light upon the Jesuits with regard to political questions. He says: "The order stands on the principle of the absolute rule of the church over the state. If Russia is ruled by Cæsaropapismus, the Jesuits certainly desire to rule the world by Papacæasrism, and the church, under their guidance, would become a worldly power. The church might refrain from placing Frenchmen or Russians in the German bishoprics; but it would certainly put men there who would fight with all their might against Prussia, the most powerful Protestant empire. An influential Jesuit once told me that he would love France more than Prussia, even if the former country became altogether atheistical, because an atheist was to be preferred to a Protestant. Another declared that he would never pray for a Protestant German Emperor."

According to our author, the Jesuit ideal would bring about a terrible condition of affairs. He says, if the Jesuits could order governments, "Canonical law would predominate over civil law; a person excommunicated by the church would lose all his civil rights; ecclesiastical censure would control the press, and pass judgment upon all publications; trials against heretics would be revived, and the heretic who refused to do as the church commanded would be put to death at the stake, which would become a potent factor in politics."

With regard to the conscience of the Jesuits, Graf Hoensbroech has this to say: "Certain easy excuses and mental reservations are used by most men at times to quiet their consciences; but Jesuitism educates men to adopt such excuses for all transactions during life; it teaches untruth systematically. There is an air of falsity and deceit about the order which depressed me continually; the lying answers in Gury's 'Moral Theology' are perfectly natural to, and consistent with Jesuitism."

The distinguished ex-Jesuit closes his paper with the following words:

"Instead of helping a weak mind to understand the dictates of conscience, and removing all doubts and ifs and buts; instead of assisting the earnest searcher after truth to make his peace with God; instead of leading men to make use of their own, good, common sense,—omnis animo naturalitis christiana, men are led to trust to casuistic decisions, and thus to lose themselves in a labyrinth of doubts. Neither the Jesuitic doctrine of church, state and school, nor the Jesuitic doctrine about the dictates of conscience have I ever accepted ex animo. I have tried to make these doctrines my own, but failed lamentably."—Literary Digest.

UNITED BRETHREN DENOUNCE THE LODGES.

The anti-secrecy reform has many strong friends in Nebraska, as was manifest in the Wausa convention of last September, and we are, therefore, not surprised at the vigor of the following resolution passed at the recent conference of the United Brethren in that State:

We re-affirm our position of radical opposition to all secret societies. We believe they are anti-Christian in character and detrimental to mankind, socially, legally and morally; that they are a curse to this nation and ought to be outlawed. The rapid growth of these societies is a continual menace to our government and to our religious liberties, and ought to stimulate us in our efforts to destroy them; therefore,

Resolved, That we as a conference pledge ourselves to continue the anti-secrecy agitation.

Elkhorn Annual Conference of the same church, Bishop Barnaby presiding, at Vim, Neb., October 12, 1893, adopted the following:

WHEREAS, The history of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ is a history of unrelenting opposition to the evil of secretism, the fathers of the church having taken strong grounds against this giant evil in its infancy, not only assailing the principles of secrecy in private, but in public discourse, in legislative enactment and by constitutional law, forbidding membership in the church to members of secret societies; and,

WHEREAS, Their arguments against and their arraignment of this evil have not been met nor their force broken, nor has any successful attempt been made on the part of these societies to justify themselves or to prove their innocence, but they stand confessedly guilty as charged by the fathers of the church; and,

WHEREAS, This sin, as opposed by the founders of the church, has grown strong and is now in the zenith of its power, increasing in wickedness and corruption as it increases in members, adding to the sin of its principle the wickedness of its practices, thus disturbing the home, corrupting the state and invading the holy precincts of the Christian church, robbing it of its male membership, of its money, and lowering the standard of its spirituality; and,

WHEREAS, Secretism is of darkness and not of the light, and its oaths prohibited in the Word of God; therefore,

Resolaed, That we as a conference do hereby re-affirm our former declaration of opposition to this growing evil; that we will carefully guard against the reception of members of secret societies into our church, support our constitution as it now stands, and pray for the extirpation of this system of wickedness.

THE TEMPERANCE LAW IN TENNESSEE.

"If these people want to get up a bloody riot, I am willing; I'il give them all they want of it," Governor Tillman said Jan. 29th, concerning the dispensary trouble in Charleston. "What is more, I'll have the legislature here to back me up in this effort to enforce the laws of the State, and I want them to understand this. If they think they are going to bluff, frighten or bullyrag me or my constables they are mistaken. I am not going to have these toughs ride roughshod over the laws, and if the good people of Charleston cannot prevail upon the barkeepers to obey the laws and stop resisting them, I intend going right ahead on the policy I have decided upon. I have as many constables as the police force of Charleston, and if it is necessary they will be fitted out with Winchester rifles and they will be backed up by the police force of the city. I have every confidence in Chief Martin. I want these people to understand that I am as coldblooded about this matter as I can be. I have never been more determined than I am in this case, and I want these people to understand once and for all time that I propose to see the laws of the State upheld even if we have to kill a few of these Italian cut-throats and bulldozers. I am making no threat, but I am simply warning them. I am ready to go ahead if they are. I am not angry."

The governor's remarks were intensified by reading a report he received from Chief Constable Gaillard in which the latter said that the barkeepers' and bartenders' association had conspired to resist the enforcement of the law. Governor Tillman, in concluding what he had to say, remarked:

"All I want to say up to the handle is that no amount of bluffing and big talk, and killing even, will stop me in my efforts to enforce the law. The law will have to be obeyed. It must go on until I stop illicit whisky selling in Charleston, if it takes all the military and constables in the State to do it."

WORKINGMEN IN THE CHURCHES.

Speaking of the oft-repeated complaint that the workingmen are becoming separated from the church because the Gospel is not preached in the simplicity of the love of Christ, and because church members are not in sympathy with them, the Rev. E. R. Donehoo says in the Presbyterian Banner: "Take the workingmen and their families out of the churches of Pittsburgh and a beggarly array of empty pews would greet the visitors on the Sabbath-day. There is not a church in the entire district in which the writer has spent a quarter of a century in preaching to workingmen [and the members of these churches are numbered by thousands] that could keep open a single day if it were not for the workingmen, who constitute nine-tenths of the regular attendants, and an equal proportion of the contributing force." This testimony is true. Far too much has been made of the pew system, the supposed pride of the church members, and all that, as hindering the workingmen from attending the services. You will find very many of these same sensitive people at the theater, where they pay far more for their seat than any church would ask, where they are in contact with far more pride, and where there is far more exclusiveness, and also immeasurably less that is profitable or helpful.—United Presbyterian.

DOCTRINES OF THE ANARCHISTS.

The more than 1,000 millions of human beings which inhabit our earth and live, more or less, in a state of social order may be fitly divided into the following four classes:

1. Monsters.
2. Barbarians.
3. Men of the lower orders.
4. Men of the higher orders.

Monsters are all those who, without doing any work themselves, make use of the stupidity or cowardice of the laboring classes to deprive them of the fruits of their labor, either by open robbery or by swindling and cheating. This class is composed of all kings, princes, priests, ministers, millionaires, and all those who possess more than is needed for a life of comfort and ease; all those who regard the laboring classes as only slaves to serve them, simply machines for making money.

Barbarians are all those who reverence a prince of this world or a god, or gods in heaven, who bow to a master, pray to deity, and listen to priests. Besides these, there are multitudes of cowards and canting hypocrites who pray to these terrestrial and celestial gods; the men who scrape together what feeds the first-named monsters, and do not care how low they sink in the scale of manhood if they only can make a small profit themselves. This class numbers in its ranks all those workmen who suffer themselves to be chained and down-trodden.

Men of the lower orders are all those who acknowledge that the condition of the people in our so-called civilized countries is abominable, but choose inadequate means for relief. These people fancy that the great sores of our social system, the terrible disease which has taken hold of all nations, can be cured with little bits of sticking-plaster. This class is composed of all Reformers, Socialists, Freethinkers, Liberal writers like Charles Dickens, Victor Hugo, and others who have the courage to show to the monster class its wickedness, but still believe that the Church and State are able to cure social evils. To this class belong, in fact, all those who think that society could be reformed by writing and talking.

Men of the higher orders are all those who see clearly; the men who understand that only a total annihilation of the first-mentioned "Monster" class can give relief to the world. The men who know that this cannot be done without the most fearful struggle, but who are ready to enter upon this struggle, and to take active part in the destruction of the Robber and Monster class.

To this class belong the Anarchists.—Freiheit, International Organ of the German-Speaking Anarchists, New York.

NOTES FROM INDIA.

While warning sinners, from house to house, this week, we have found six souls awakened and under conviction. The Lord is blessing our labors and the seed is taking root. And he hath said, "Behold the days come, that the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him that soweth seed." Seed-time and harvest will run together in soul-saving work, if the Lord's laborers are diligent in business, and fervent in spirit. As we talked with one young man, he listened solemnly with tearful eyes, and quickly said yes, when asked if we should pray with him. But not having a private place in which to press him immediately into God's kingdom, we expounded the Word to the family with the Holy Spirit helping; then we knelt in prayer. Although a deep impression was made upon their hearts, yet we are not satisfied unless they begin to "roar" through the disquietude of their souls. In the same tenement house, another man, a Freemason, bought books on Masonry, and as we labored and prayed with him, he was somewhat awakened, but as he had never been closely dealt with before concerning his soul, he was taken by surprise, and felt that he could not decide for eternity without giving the matter consideration. God tells us to count the cost, and gives men time to do so; but they must not be too long about it. This man invited us to come again. This is no mean sign, especially when we hit hard at sin, and rap Freemasonry on the head. . . .

We don't believe in letting Satan have his way, in leaving some of his children to be prayed for by the priest only. One old gray-headed man, who worshiped God without Christ Jesus, because he is a Freemason, said that he wished he could believe as the writer did, after earnestly praying with him. Told him that he could if he wanted to. Heathenism and spurious Christianity do not hinder the Lord our God from showing forth his glory from the heavens, in India.—Malcolm Moss, (Bombay), in the Firebrand.

As might have been expected, from the result of the election in Iowa last fall, the Republicans of that State are endeavoring to nullify the prohibitory liquor law. Their action is embodied in what is known as the "mulct" bill, now before the Legislature, which provides for a tax or mulct of $1,000 per annum, to be a lien against the property and the keeper of any place where intoxicating liquors are sold. It is to be collected like other taxes. City or town councils may by ordinance assess it in monthly installments to be paid in advance, and such payments are to be bar against prosecution under the State law prohibiting unlawful sale of intoxicating liquors. In towns and cities which do not pass an ordinance regulating this tax the ordinary law against sale of liquor is to be enforced. It simply amounts to this: That the prohibitory law remains in force, while the new license scheme provides the saloonkeeper with a means of evading it.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Evolution.—The religious life of our colleges.—Lodge matters.—Legislative. — Episcopacy in Vermont.—A strange state of things in a Connecticut village.

How long did it take to evolve the first man from a tadpole? History stares helplessly at such a problem, and science, even with Prof. Drummond for an interpreter, does not do much better. She only wrinkles up her forehead—the star-eyed goddess—and begins to talk about the eocene and the tertiary periods, and the Devonian and Silurian formations. A hundred thousand or a hundred million years are all one to her; but try to pin her down to even approximate data and you may as well question the babe new-born. All you can do is to stand with a shivering sense of nothingness gazing into the vast abyss of the ages that have been, as they roll in a noiseless avalanche down the heights of that measureless eternity that lies behind us, the beginnings of which no archangel is old enough to record. But to come back to cause and effect—that is to say, the particular thing which set me off on this geological train of thought. It was simply the sight of one of those marvels of hideous deformity called a fashion-plate; abnormally broad shoulders, hourglass waist, of exactly the same girth as the neck, inflated balloons for sleeves, tapering off into the proportion of a pipe-stem at the wrist. Even Darwin does not tell us how long it took to evolve a man from a monkey, to say nothing of a tadpole, but I am sure that it could not be a circumstance to the time it must take for such a distorted, misshapen monstrosity to "evolute" into a woman, with a woman's heart in her bosom, and a woman's brain and hand to think and act. These simpering libels on the sex, it is said, are drawn from actual models, but I hope the artist allowed some rein to his imagination in the specimen before me. I venture the prediction that the time will come when an emancipated Christian womanhood will look on the fashion-plates of to-day with much the same feelings with which we now regard the rude stone-idols worshiped by our barbarous forefathers.

The Congregationalist has sent out inquiries to the different colleges, two of which are: First, "Is the Day of Prayer for Colleges as influential as it was ten or twenty years ago?" Second, "Are as many college graduates entering the ministry now as then?" The answers seem to show that the Day of Prayer is less regarded, and has less influence than formerly, at least in the New England colleges, though in the Western colleges, like Oberlin and Beloit, it is still a prominent factor in their religious life. But the observance or non-observance of times and seasons, which are in their very nature liable to lose ground and change, does not of necessity show any lowering of the spiritual pulse. That a smaller number of students enter the ministry is a much graver sign; but, at the same time, President Gates of Amherst thinks the proportion taken from all the colleges in the country larger than it was twenty years ago. President Carter of Williams, from a careful comparison of statistics, reaches the conclusion that so far as our Eastern colleges are concerned, the number of candidates for the ministry has steadily diminished with every decade. In returning a negative reply to the first question, he says: "It seems to me that the general condition of the churches, and the general condition of our colleges, leave less room for the influence of quiet and reflective hours than was the case some twenty-five years ago." I do not know whether Mary Lyon's rule of half an hour for solitary meditation and prayer every day, is still preserved at Mt. Holyoke. Probably not; but it is from the lack of such breathing spells daily that church and college workers alike suffer. We have got into such a habit of rushing things that we rush even our prayer-meetings and revival seasons.

Rev. N. B. Thomson, the K. of P. Brocton pastor, who was lately dismissed from his charge for immorality, is now running a fashionable restaurant on Fifth Avenue in New York;—a position which he becomes much better than the pulpit. Did his fellow-lodgemen, who advocated his cause so strenuously help him to this employment? For nearly three weeks the following advertisement has appeared in one of our Boston dailies:

I. O. O. F. and K. of P.—Will some brother assist me in getting employment of any kind? Willing and able. Address K. of P., Traveller Office.

I am curious to know how long this unfortunate "brother" will have to appeal in vain for aid from his fellow-lodgemen. The lodge is discriminating, even when it is a case of helping its own.

Fast Day is doomed. Gov. Greenhalge, like his predecessor, is opposed to retaining the form when so much of the spirit has departed. The 19th of April will be substituted and made a national holiday; but many of us will feel a pang at parting with this time-honored institution of our forefathers.

The substitute bill presented by Mr. Roe of Worcester, giving municipal suffrage to women, sticks on the way, our law-makers having been seized with qualms of fear lest it should be "unconstitutional," and the Supreme Court will be called on to settle the question before they can proceed. One of the excluded sex writes very pertinently to the Traveller, that she should like to see the court asked to decide another question: whether it is, was ever, or can be made, unconstitutional for a person, one of "we the people," to pay taxes without being represented. Think of Mrs. Hetty Green, who by the way is of Massachusetts Quaker birth, being taxed for $50,000-,000, while the foreigner who only pays a poll-tax can vote how it shall be used, and she with no voice in the matter!

Dr. Coleman's sermon at the consecration of the new bishop of Vermont, Rev. A. C. A. Hall, was a stronger defence of old-fashioned Christianity than one often hears, even from Puritan pulpits. "If it is old-fashioned," said Dr. Coleman, "to believe that the Bible is not to be subjected to the same methods of criticism as are applied to other bibles and books, but to be handled with a reserve and a reverence not belonging to them, then I am content and thankful to be 'behind the times.'" Bishop Hall has much missionary zeal, with strong leanings toward ritualism, and it has been suggested that he may, if he can call around him helpers equally zealous, "open up" many of the small unchurched communities in Vermont to Episcopal occupation. But the ritual of that church, beautiful and suggestive though it may seem to those who have grown up in her communion, is apt to be wearisome and unmeaning to the plain farmer folks used to a simpler service. They can never find the places in the Prayer-Book, and the frequent downsittings and uprisings are to them a mystery of restlessness and unreason, in which they see no poetic glamour to counterbalance a haunting suggestion of the Papacy. The whole genius of the New England character is like the Scotch, which it so much resembles—opposed to Episcopacy.

A singular and most deplorable state of affairs prevails in one of our Connecticut towns, if the Christian Secretary gives a correct report. The people of Berlin have been accustomed to hold a prayer-meeting every week in the school-house, but a Roman Catholic committeeman has hired a teacher of his own faith who punishes her scholars by making them do penance on their knees, and Protestants are now refused the privilege of holding meetings in the house. What shall be the end of such base truckling to Rome?

It is computed that the gypsy-moth is going to cost us a round million before he is annihilated. This little pest, brought over in the interest of science, and accidentally let loose, ought to point a moral which, if thoroughly learned, might compensate in some degree for the big bill he is making us pay. ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 7, 1894.

President Cleveland has, by a most unexpected act of executive clemency, deeply grieved, and to a certain extent discouraged, that element of our people which is constantly struggling in the cause of moral reform. For thirty years one family has maintained one of the lowest liquor saloons in Washington. In addition to a constant violation of the liquor-license laws, members of this family have been guilty of murder—the wife of the man who has just been pardoned killed a policeman who was trying to arrest her—and of burglary. Two years ago a license was refused to this "dive," but it continued to do business without one. Last spring the place was raided by the police and a case made against its proprietor. He was heavily fined, but he continued his illegal business. Several months later another raid was made, and it was only after a most desperate fight, in which the women of the family, including the one who had once killed a policeman, participated, that the police succeeded in arresting the proprietor. Again he was convicted, and sentenced to six months in the workhouse and to pay a fine of $500. His term expired a few days ago, and in order to escape payment of the fine he applied to the President for a pardon, alleging persecution and brutal treatment of his wife by the police as reasons why it should be granted. Although the judge, jury and prosecuting attorney in the case opposed the pardon, it was recommended by the Pardon Clerk of the Department of Justice, and granted by the President, on condition that a fine of $100 be paid. How the people of Washington regard this pardon may be judged from the following extracts from a leading editorial in the Evening Star, the most influential and most conservative newspaper we have: "President Cleveland suffers from unsound advisers. His latest error—and so far as Washington is concerned, the most serious one—was the pardoning of John Shea, convicted of selling liquor without a license. The offense for which John Shea was sent to prison and fined is one with which no decent citizen has any sympathy, and the police officers who are actively engaged in trying to stamp it out deserve all commendation and support. . . . In New York the police are being investigated and held up to public reprobation because of their connivance with and inactivity against the prototypes of the Sheas in that city. In Washington the Executive 'rebukes,' by the exercise of the pardoning power, police activity against this class of law-breakers. In championing the Sheas the President slaps in the face the moral sentiment of this city."

A petition is now being signed at the store of a native Armenian, in this city, asking President Cleveland to use his good offices to ameliorate the condition of the Armenians (of whom there are more than 8,000 living in the United States) in their native land, and to secure three reforms. First, a governor who is not a Mohammedan; second, courts in which Christians shall stand on an equal footing with Mohammedans; third, the spending of at least a part of the revenues collected in Armenia in that country.

The Senate to-day passed the bill for the repeal of the Federal election laws. The House of Representatives has been discussing the Hawaiian question since it passed the tariff bill last week. It was intended to have taken a vote yesterday afternoon on the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, condemning the action of ex-Minister Stevens, approving the policy of the present administration, and declaring against annexation; but, owing to the refusal of the minority to vote to help make a quorum and the absence of members on the majority side of the chamber, who for reasons of their own do not desire to vote either for or against the resolution, "no quorum has prevented a vote up to this time. [The resolutions have since passed the House.—EDITOR.]

The Senate Finance Committee, which now has charge of the tariff bill, has decided to grant no hearings on the bill. While this has disappointed those who wished to be heard, it will result in getting the bill before the Senate much earlier than would have been possible had hearings been granted.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey arrived in Washington to-day, and the first of their series of meetings will be held to-night. The pastors of the evangelical churches have signed a petition to the business men in Washington, asking that, during the four weeks these meetings are to be held, they will close their places of business daily, except Saturdays, at 5:30 P. M., in order that they and their employes may be afforded "an opportunity of sharing in the benefits which it is devoutly to be hoped will be secured." It is expected that most of the merchants will accede to this request.

It was announced this week that twenty-five employes of the U. S. Pension Bureau had been discharged for habitual drunkenness. Still there are misguided people who ask: "Why agitate the temperance question?" *

REFORM NEWS.

THE COMING PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

457 NORTH SIXTH STREET,
PHILADELPHIA, Pa., Feb. 8, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The good news comes that we are likely to have a strong delegation from Boston to our convention. In addition to the New England Agent, Bro. E. T. McIntire, Mrs. A. E. Stoddard and Miss Ella Carter will probably be with us. These are all workers well-known to New England friends.

Cynosure readers have read of the wonderful way in which the Lord has led Bro. McIntire out of lodge darkness into his marvelous light. Those who possibly can will want to hear him. Don't fail to be at the seceders' testimony meeting, Monday afternoon, Feb. 26.

Miss Carter, of the Boston Conservatory of Music will be a great help in the musical line.

Those who heard the thrilling testimony of Mrs. Ella Reidy at the Allegheny Convention, last year, will be glad to know that she, with two others, is expecting to meet with us again this year.

Last Sabbath I had a very pleasant meeting with friends at Grater's Ford. On reaching there, Saturday, I was met at the depot by Bro. Krupp and conducted to his home, where I found arrangements made for my comfort. Sabbath morning Rev. Mr. Wismer spoke in the German language from 2 Cor. 1: 21, and your agent followed. I could not understand what he said. The audience seemed to understand me as well as Bro. Wismer. Our views of the teachings of the text appeared to be similar. In the afternoon, by request, I addressed the children of the German Baptist Sabbath-school. They were not so likely to be led into the lodge, as enticed into the saloon; so I made reference to the danger of that soul-destroying place. So far as I could learn, the only Mason in this town is the saloon-keeper.

Notwithstanding Sabbath evening was stormy, the Mennonite Brethren church was well-filled with those wishing to hear why Christians should not go into secret lodges. The collection indicated a willingness to help. Several expressed their intention to attend the convention. Calls at the homes of Rev. Messrs. Connor and Kulp were encouraging. Both subscribed for the Cynosure. These brethren are ministers in the German Baptist church. Bro. Kulp has been afflicted for some time, his trouble confining him to the house. His interest in the cause of Christ as manifest in reforms is great, and he was pleased to know of progress being made.

At Schwenksville I was disappointed in not finding Rev. Mr. Gottshall, pastor of the Mennonite church at home. Some of his members subscribed for the Cynosure and expressed a wish to hear me lecture. I spoke at Beulah Mission in this city Tuesday evening. Five lectures and addresses are arranged for the future.

Father expects to come to my aid soon. There must be much personal visitation.

There has been a very encouraging response to my request for entertainment. I am satisfied that friends here will be glad to entertain those coming from a distance. Do not feel backward about writing of your coming. I will try and assign all who write to places of entertainment before we gather, that they may go directly to the homes provided.

Let us stand shoulder to shoulder and move grandly forward in the name of our Captain. Our enemy and God's enemy is fortressed and united. Now is the time for every man and woman on the Lord's side to be at their place of duty. Don't let any one think "I will not be missed from that great gathering," but let each one who can embrace this opportunity to let his or her light shine and show the world which side they are on. Pray for this meeting; plan to attend it, and report, if possible, at the first session. More next week. W. B. STODDARD.

CORRESPONDENCE.

A DELAYED LETTER—EXPERIENCES OF AN ANTI-SECRETIST.

[The following letter, from an esteemed co-worker, was received some time ago, and contains much of interest, although its publication has been delayed. But it has lost none of its excellence. It comes to us from Holyoke, Colo. —EDITOR CYNOSURE.]

One taking the Cynosure and reading articles in different papers from Maine to California, or from Washington to Florida, would be reminded of the brightest stars in the heavens shining forth at night. It would seem to an idle spectator that if all the anti-secretists were in one State, we would have things in a glorious condition. But this would not do, for it would not be a starry heaven were all the stars in one bunch. Neither would it be God's will to have us all in one State or district. . . . .

The love of money, which is the "root of all evil" has brought upon us legions of secret societies, theft, hypocrisy, drunkenness, and a host of other evils, which, when man becomes a participator in the life of Christ, will then leave him. "Ye cannot serve God and Mammon." . . . .

Once, about six months ago, while in quiet conversation on the streets of Holyoke, I asserted before a secretist that if we had 300 less secret societies in the United States we would be a better nation, and men would stand better before God. An Odd-fellow wanted to know what I had against secret societies, saying that they "are benevolent and obliged to be charitable to each other," and that nearly all the preachers of the land belong to some secret order. I replied: "That is the trouble. You take into the lodge the stoutest, heartiest and most influential men that we have, and always those that have a means of making a living, and you obligate yourselves to each other, and, thereby, against all outsiders. Christ says: 'I ever spake openly, and in secret have I said nothing.' Paul says: 'Prove that which is acceptable unto the Lord, and have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but reprove them, for it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret.' Again: 'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers.'" And I continued: "In Freemasonry they swear themselves to aid and assist each other in any of their laudable undertaknga, except in murder and treason; and in the seventh degree they swear to aid and assist a worthy brother so far as to espouse his cause, whether he be right or wrong." I then told him that I did not think that this kind of men ought to be in office, or preach to the people.

As evidence to substantiate my statements, I said: "See the rich getting richer, and the poor getting poorer; the large percentage of our farms being mortgaged, and scarcely, or not at all, redeemable; the times getting harder, and the difficulty of raising good crops; these things show the displeasure of God."

One fellow assured me that when I spoke of the secrets of Freemasonry, I did not know one word of what I was talking about.....After he had made his little defenseless speech about my ignorance, going around, and pointing his finger to several different persons in the crowd, he said to each: "Can he" (meaning me) "know anything of the secrets of an order unless he belongs to it?"—and each, in turn, said "No." I got him to say three times that he was sure I knew nothing of the secrets of Masonry. Then I wrote "Mah-hah-bone," and asked him to pronounce it, holding it up before him. To evade this test, he said that he did not know what it was, where I got it, or what it meant. I told him that Mackey says that it means "What! Is this the builder?" At each excuse he made, I asked him to pronounce the word, but he made no attempt to do so. I said: "It is Mah-hah-bone—now say it;" but I could in no way get him to speak the word.

Then I told him why he would not say it; that when he was raised from the dead on "the five points of fellowship—foot to foot, knee to knee, hand to back, breast to breast, and mouth to ear," the Master whispered "Mah-ha-bone" in his ear, and he had sworn never to give it in any other way than he had received it, and then only in a whisper; and if he would not now say "Mah-hah-bone," never to say that I knew nothing of the secrets of Masonry. I also assured members of the fraternity present that I had the oldest right here, having distributed tracts here before their lodges were organized, or before Holyoke was a town; and that I should exercise my right by saying what I pleased and where I pleased. J. T. CULLOR.

(To be concluded.)

THE LORD'S WORK AT CUBA, N. Y.

CUBA, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE: T. H. Osborne, the Chicago drummer evangelist, has been conducting a two-weeks' union effort of great success in Cuba, N. Y., where a hundred and fifty, or more, have confessed Jesus. Brother Osborne is a man thoroughly consecrated, a reformed drunkard, and one who wages an unyielding and vigorous warfare against drink, tobacco, the theatre, the dance, dice, cards, the lodge, etc. His words are sharp and cutting, yet he is always greeted by a crowded house. He aims to bring the degraded outcast, as well as the respectable, to Jesus. None of our Cynosure people need to hesitate for a moment in giving him their hearty assistance and God-speed in the glorious work, should he come their way, for he strikes hard at organized secretism. His next work is with the Glenwood M. E. church, at Buffalo, N. Y.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects. By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

LODGE NOTES.

(From secret society papers.)

There are now over three-quarters of a million Freemasons in North America.

To make the lodge successful put some life in it. Have a "blow out" occasionally, even if it does cost a dollar or two.

What is the difference between a Subordinate and a Rebekah lodge? One is odd and the other is even. How so? To the first the members go singly, while to the latter they attend in pairs.

The largest Masonic Lodge in the United States is said to be Minneapolis, No. 19, at Minneapolis, Minn., with 601 members, and the next largest as Genesee Falls, Rochester, N. Y., with 595.

The Odd-fellows compose the largest and richest secret society in the world, and carry out any undertaking in which they are likely to engage. The order is growing at the rate of 30,000 a year.

The brother, or brothers, who will devise a plan whereby the encampment branch of Odd-fellowship will keep equal pace with the subordinate, each in turn helping, and neither exerting an influence to weaken the other, will be a Solomon whose memory will be perpetuated.

Freemasonry in northern China is as actively at work as elsewhere. There are a district Grand Lodge, fully manned, eight Craft Lodges and one lodge of instruction under English, Scotch and Massachusetts constitutions, three R. A. Chapters, and one Rose Croix Chapter, a lodge of the Royal Order of Scotland, a Preceptory and a Consistory. There are likewise a Masonic charity fund and two public school scholarships.

The general laws of Missouri have a provision that an initiate member must wait two weeks for the first degree, four for the second and six for the third. He is then not permitted to advance unless he "shall learn correctly the unwritten work and the obligation of each degree." Ohio laws provide that the candidate shall satisfactorily pass examination in open lodge in each step he has made in the order. [There is nothing in this item to indicate to which order it relates. It may mean one or all.—ED. CYNOSURE.]

TO PUT ON needed flesh, no matter how you've lost it, take Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. It works wonders. By restoring the normal action of the deranged organs and functions, it builds the flesh up to a safe and healthy standard—promptly, pleasantly, and naturally. The weak, emaciated, thin, pale and puny are made strong, plump, round, rosy, and robust. Nothing so effective as a strength-restorer and flesh-maker is known to medical science. Filthy Cod Liver Oil and all its disguised compounds can't compare with it.

They build up fat, not healthy flesh.

Practically, you can get the "Discovery" on trial. In everything that's claimed for it—in purifying the blood, and building up the flesh and strength—if it ever fails to benefit or cure, you have your money back.

On these terms, is any substitute that may pay a dealer better to urge and sell, likely to be "just as good" for you to buy?

Nothing else, at any price, is really as cheap. You pay only for the good you get.

MY WIFE CANNOT SEE HOW YOU DO IT AND PAY FREIGHT.
$10.50 Buy the Oxford Improved SINGER Sewing Machine, with a complete set of attachments and guaranteed for 10 years. The Christian Cynosure.

HENRY M. HUGUNIN - - - - Editor.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 15, 1894.

A BROTHERHOOD THAT IS NOT A LODGE.

The Christian World, of Dayton, Ohio, the organ of the Reformed church, gives publicity to the following extract from a correspondent, who writes on "The Brotherhood," a society established in that church. Its earnest words against secret societies and their connection with the church are worthy of attentive consideration:

"The Brotherhood is most successfully adapted to bring young men to hear the Gospel preached and taught. It is a work by young men for young men. It forms a splendid antidote for the poison of the godless secret societies which are winning some oi the best blood of every church, for it unites them in truly fraternal bonds aad leads them to see that whatever help, either of temporal or spiritual nature, they are able to bestow is first needed among their own people."

The Lutheran Standard, which always opposes secret societies, makes the following comment on the foregoing: "We have knowledge of a Reformed minister who positively refuses to tolerate secretists in his congregation. His demands are: Leave the lodge or the church. The good work is going on. Those hitherto blind to the situation are beginning to see whither secretists are driving them. Let us take courage and continue our warfare against this unmitigated evil."

The Cynosure is in hearty sympathy with any Christian denomination that keeps its skirts clear of the lodge abomination.

A WOMAN'S PLAINT AGAINST MASONS.

Mrs. Emily Bresee, who has lived at Council Bluffs, Iowa, and in Missouri Valley, and of whose afflictions Cynosure readers are not wholly ignorant, on Friday last made public a letter of considerable interest. It is one that she recently wrote to the head of the Masonic fraternity of Iowa, in which she claims that her foster-father, on his death-bed, had made a confession that would prove her to be entitled to considerable property. This confession, she states, was placed in the care of the Masonic lodge at Shellsburgh, Iowa, to be returned to her at a specified time. Now, she alleges, a prominent man in the lodge, who had an interest in keeping her out of the property, refused to turn over the paper, and that when she made complaint, he caused charges of insanity to be brought against her. In conclusion, she asks for a thorough investigation and for justice.

The previous history may be briefly summed up as follows: Some years ago, while she was living in Missouri Valley, she was charged by citizens of the place with being insane, and the commissioners judged her so and gave her into the care of the county supervisors. She appealed the case and was placed in the custody of her husband. In 1891 she appealed to the Pottawattamie County authorities, who decided that she was sane and removed all restraint on her actions.

If her story is true, her appeal for redress should be heeded. If Masons are willfully withholding her own frem her, common justice and that humanity and benevolence which, it is said, characterize the fraternity will find a fine field for exercise in the restoration of her property.

JESUITICAL SENTIMENT.

On Monday evening, at Central Music Hall, Chicago, "Father" Thos. Sherman (son of the General) delivered a lecture to a fair audience, in which he defended the Jesuits, praising them inordinately, and vilifying their opponents. In giving the copy of his lecture to the Chicago Herald for publication, he mixed with it a part of another lecture, not yet delivered in public, and the whole was published as the lecture of Monday night. The interpolated sentences read as follows:

"For my own part I have no apology to offer for the acts of Catholics in vigorous protest against these wholesale venders of infamy. The father who slays the corrupter of his child must be left to the Almighty; the man who shoots an anarchist at sight is a public benefactor. These ex-priests are anarchists of the worst stamp. They appeal to free speech. If free speech means the right to debauch the minds of women and children at pleasure, then I, for one, say better free bullets than free speech. If America will not draw the line between freedom and license, then America means chaos and old night. There is no right to do public wrong, and every town and village must prevent it. Sue for libel. The evil is done when the suit is begun. Of course, I know you will not agree with me, but if the blight of corruption were to threaten your own you would act on the principle of prevention. There are certain questions that cannot be touched in public without doing vast harm. The state exists to preserve public morality."

Evidence is abundant that the Jesuit lecturer did not on Monday evening give utterance to this characteristic language, but he does not deny that he wrote it for delivery on another occasion. It is sufficient to know that these detestable sentiments are his own, and a very good index to the principles maintained by the Jesuits.

THE A. P. A. AT WORK.

Within the past week the secular press has given much prominence to the American Protective Association and its advocates, recounting several instances in which it has manifested itself in politics and the arrest of persons who have, in its interest, created unwholesome excitement in different localities.

Among the latter was Sims, the Wisconsin State Lecturer of the order, charged with inciting riot and promulgating libels upon individuals who oppose it. At Kaukana, had he not been detained by official warrant, he would have encountered an angry crowd of Catholics. Upon his return to Oshkosh, after giving bail for his appearance in court, and accompanied by numerous friends, he was met at the depot by another excited mob, and several fights occurred before Sims was safely housed.

The A. P. A., it is also said, is becoming the supporter of the ex-priest McNamara, who was recently arrested in Missouri for using language obnoxious to Catholics, and it is reported that the names of 500 members of the A. P. A. have been secured by the prosecutor of McNamara. As a consequence, the prosecutor is threatened with vengeance.

The strength of the A. P. A. as a political factor is also sensibly felt in Central Illinois in connection with future nominations for State officers. "The A. P. A. practically controls affairs in Peoria county," said one gentleman, "and this fact has been demonstrated by recent elections. The vote there on county officers and for mayor shows what a power the American Protective Association is. It is conceded that in Peoria, which is largely Democratic, the A. P. A. can elect any man it endorses and nominates. I am told that the same state of affairs exists in Sangamon county, which is also strongly Democratic."

This is but the beginning of the trouble which is likely to arise from the manuevering of this increasing secret "patriotic" society. Its ostensible "patriotism" is an attraction that readily captivates a very large political force in every community.

"KNIGHTS OF THE GOLDEN EAGLE."

We are indebted to Rev. Allen M. Fretz, pastor of the Deep Run and Zion Mennonite churches at Souderton, Penn., for the information presented in the following description of the "Knights of the Golden Eagle." It differs little, it will be seen, from many other of the "protective" and "endowment" branches of modern secret societies, but is of sufficient importance to interest our readers.

The objects of this comparatively new order include the promotion of the principles of lodge benevolence, by affording mutual relief, in sickness and affliction, to members, their widows and orphans; by assisting those out of employment, encouraging each other in business, providing social and moral benefits in several ways. Like all lodge-charity, its benevolence begins in the lodge, and is confined exclusively to its membership —or as much of it as keeps its dues paid up.

Its membership comprises all nationalities and classes of society, and all religions that acknowledge the brotherhood of man and the fatherhood of a supreme deity, and is made up of males of and over eighteen years of age.

The origin of the order dates back to its foundation in Baltimore, Md. February 6, 1873, and was introduced into Pennsylvania in October, 1875. Its first supreme lodge (or "castle") was organized at Baltimore January 22, 1878. Its growth was very slow for twelve years, but in 1875, in Philadelphia and other Eastern cities, it began to assume increased importance, and gained in membership more rapidly.

Its present condition is stated to be healthful. On the 10th of June, 1893, it had a membership of over 70,000 in thirty-five States, divided among 833 "castles", 472 of which were in Pennsylvania, with a membership of over 42,000. The "relief" figures of the State "castles" showed that out of total receipts of $1,821,334.19, the amount paid to afflicted members aggregated only $618,540.31; while the total disbursements ("including investments") had been $1,706,315,65. In financial matters it differs but little from the other secret orders that boast so loudly of their "benevolence."

The organization of the order consists of one Supreme Castle, one Grand Castle for each State or jurisdiction, and as many subordinate castles as may be created in one or all the States. Twenty-five petitioners are sufficient to obtain a charter for a subordinate castle. The officers of a castle consist of a Past Chief, Noble Chief, High Priest, Venerable Hermit, Master of Records, Clerk of Exchequer, Keeper of Exchequer, Sir Herald, Worthy Bard, Worthy Chamberlain, Ensign, Esquire, First and Second Guardsmen.

The ritualistic work of the order consists of three degrees: First, or Pilgrim's degree, teaching fidelity and eternal faithfulness to God and our fellow-men. Second, or Knight's degree, in which the honors of Knighthood are conferred upon the Pilgrim, arming and equipping him with a higher order of virtues, etc., in the most flowery manner. Third, or Crusader's degree, which sends him out, in the panoply of the lodge, in a crusade against the hosts of evil. The ritual, it is claimed, "portrays, by form and ceremony, symbol and allegory, the struggles of a Christian warrior to gain the immortal crown;" and from the description of it sent to us, it must be about as bombastic and unsatisfying as those in the higher degrees of Freemasonry. This ritualistic work, we are also told, has "a semi-military character, lending an air of grandeur not incident to other civic societies." "Our ritual," it is said, "is a poem of undoubted beauty, casting its bright sheen through the walls of secrecy."

By the way, we are told that "the only secrecy of the order is for the purpose of protecting those who join our ranks, and in order that we may know one another—a talismanic brotherhood."

The motto of the order is "Fidelity, Valor and Honor."

Social meetings (with all the trimmings) are allowable once a month, to get acquainted and fraternize on intimate terms. Families and friends of members can attend these sociables.

The military feature of the order is not obligatory on members, but it serves to give popularity to it among the younger adherents.

The order has an elaborate uniform, of dress and fatigue patterns, which is seemingly very elaborate, "stunning" and expensive, including swords, gloves, gold lace, and gewgaws. The regalia is "a silk ribbon badge, worn upon the left breast; suspended from the ribbon is a medallion, containing the representation of an angel crowning a Knight!" (What for?)

Good health and soundness of limb are requisites that applicants for membership must possess, and their reputations should be such as not to disgrace the lodge.

The insurance features of the order are concentrated in a branch known as "the Death Benefit Fund of the Knights of the Golden Eagle," controlled by members under the direct supervision of the Supreme Castle. This fund, an aggregation of payments made by members in good standing, between the ages of 18 and 45 years, who have passed a medical examination prior to their admission, is distributed among the survivors of dead members, but in no case can any one receive more than $1,000. The admission fee and expenses amount to $2,75. The annual payment to the fund is $1.00 from each member, payable quarterly in advance.

Each person, upon becoming a member of the order, must pay not less than $3, which entitles him to the three degrees. Castles may require a larger fee. This is the entire expense, as the Knights are not obliged to purchase any portion of the uniform. Each castle possesses power to regulate its own dues, benefits, assessments and fees. All business is transacted in the Third degree. One password is given out semi-annually, and with this a member can visit any castle in the United States or Canada.

Candidates for initiation are accepted or rejected by ballot.

There are other features of this order that might be enumerated; but these will suffice to show the general character and object of the institution. Aside from the insurance feature, which is very partial in its benefits, its other peculiarities are all in the line of attraction, show and glitter, without one redeeming trait to commend it to Christians.

THE JESUIT AS HE IS.

Thomas E. Sherman, son of Gen. Wm. T. Sherman, who by the grace of the Roman Catholic church is permitted to bear the title of "Father Sherman," lectured on the Jesuits in this city on Monday of last week. Of course the majority of his hearers were Roman Catholics.

The lecture was a fulsome laudation of the Jesuits, from first to last, and abuse of those who have honestly portrayed the character of these wily hypocrites—such men as Bulwer and Macaulay—and those governments of Europe who, in times past, finding this secret society inimical to the interests of their respective institutions and peoples, drove them out as pests and vermin.

We have neither space nor inclination to quote the "holy father's" flattery of this dangerous fraternity; but we make room for this one passage, which may mean that he thinks the Jesuits have a right in the United States under the Constitution and Declaration of Independence, and that if it is proposed to banish the Jesuit, the laws which protect him here should first be stricken out. This is the most liberal construction, we think, that can be placed upon his language; which is as follows:

"Banish the Jesuits! First banish the American Constitution and Declaration of Independence!"

After reading this lecture we no longer wonder that stalwart General Sherman, the hero of many bloody conflicts in support of the United States Constitution and our national liberties, was grieved at heart when his son became a Jesuit and a Roman Catholic priest.

It was the infamous doctrines of the Jesuits of which the French Parliament said, in its decree expelling them from France, in 1762: "The consequence of these doctrines would destroy natural law—that rule of morality which God himself has implanted in the hearts of men—and consequently would break all the ties of civil society, in authorizing theft, lying, perjury, the most criminal impurity, and generally all passions and all crimes, ... destroy all feelings of humanity among men, in authorizing homicide and parricide," etc. And one of their own publications, in 1640, says of them: "Their birthplace offers them no motive of personal interest." "Father" Sherman is no exception. The American Constitution and the Declaration of Independence, under which he was born, may go, but he would have the Jesuits stay!

There are certain facts to which the most conservative citizen and the most spiritless Protestant must bow in these times.

1. The Jesuits are in close alliance with the Roman Catholic church, and with no other. Their united interests are in harmony for the aggrandizement of the latter and the welfare of the former.

2. Roman Catholicism is the bitter enemy of Protestantism, towards which, from the Pope down to the bell-boy at the altar, the spirit of malevolence never ceases. Every thought and act of the Church of Rome is tinctured with its hatred of Protestantism. Between it and Protestantism is a great gulf fixed as impassable as that which lay between Dives and Lazarus in Abraham's bosom—a gulf that no amount of argument can bridge over. The Protestant has nothing to expect from the combination of Jesuit and Catholic—not even toleration in the land made sacred by the Pilgrims of 1620.

These are "the cold, hard facts" by which the Protestants are confronted to-day. We must still be Protestants—still protest against the barbarity and deceits of the wily, secret enemies of our faith and country.

—On the eve of going to press we have received intelligence of the death at Wheaton, on Saturday last, of Mrs. Chas. A. Blanchard. The heartfelt sympathy of all readers of the Cynosure, we are sure, will be tendered to her afflicted husband and children. The funeral took place on Tuesday forenoon, at 10 o'clock. A further obituary notice, we expect, will shortly be printed.

—The Benevolent Order of Elks is in danger of disruption, two separate meetings of the Grand Lodge having been called—one to meet at Atlantic City, N. J., and the other at Jamestown, N. Y. This order is largely composed of dramatic people, and is convivial as well as benevolent.

—In a Western State, recently, the Masons lost their lodge-room by fire. The next lodge meeting was held in an open grove—tylers being stationed around it to keep off women and cowans—cows also, presumably. It was only going back to the first principles of the paganism from which Freemasonry derives its present form of lodge-worship.

—Mrs. S. A. Keller, of Portland, Ore., called at this office last week, while on her way home from a visit to friends in this State. As a member of the United Brethren church, she was, for four years, a parishioner of Rev. P. B. Williams, of whom she speaks in the highest terms in connection with his work in the anti-secret reform on the Pacific Coast.

—Coughlin's trial for the murder of Dr. Cronin is drawing to a close. The evidence of the past week has been mainly occupied with denials of the testimony produced by the prosecution, and an effort to prove an aliba for Coughlin on the night of the murder. Rebutting evidence was also introduced by the prosecution. The case now goes to the lawyers for argument.

—Last week a conference of ministers and laymen was held in St. Louis, including delegates from Chicago, Memphis, Kansas City, Detroit, Cincinnati, Denver, Minneapolis, and other large cities, having for its object a discussion of the best methods of city evangelization. The gathering is principally composed of members of the Christian church. Rev. J. A. Lord, of Cincinnati, extolled the work of evangelists, and added: "If the Protestants showed a sympathy and a personal interest in the poor people, they would take away many from (the church of) Rome, but secret secieties and A. P. A. organizations make better Catholics of the masses." Other speakers were equally pertinent in their remarks.

—The Associate Presbyterian Magazine supports, very forcibly, the position always taken by the Cynosure, that "one objection that lies against all secret societies, whatever may be their origin, nature or object, is their systematic secrecy." It pursues this subject quite as forcibly, by denouncing secret societies as undermining mutual confidence between man and man, by introdueing elements of suspicion; "for where suspicion begins, confidence ends." The man who has secrets which he neither can nor desires to confide to his best friend, because they twain are separated by lodge obligations on one side, and perfect freedom of thought and judgment on the other, is an object of suspicion to the latter. If A, belonging to the lodge, will not tell B certain things because of his secret obligations, A has a right to suspect his motives and refuse to confide in him. The reason is natural. A resembles the member of a band engaged in sinful works, who dares not let his left hand, much less his innocent neighbor, know what he knows, or what he is doing. It places him in a bad light, and B does well to suspect him.

—We notice that since the Parliament of Religions at the World's Fair was held, there seems to be a disposition to establish new sects of unusual doctrines. It seems as if Paul's prophecy in 2 Timothy 4: 1–4 is daily being fulfilled that period in the history of the Christian religion when "some will not endure sound doctrine, but after their own lusts shall they heap to themselves teachers, having itching ears." We need not enumerate many of these new theologies, with their anti-Christian dogmas—"Christian Science," "Theosophy," "Liberal Universalism," "Progressive Hebrews," "Societies for Ethical Culture," and a host of others as devoid of the principles of Christianity—the Christianity of Christ, we mean—as the horde of secret societies which infest the land and draw men's minds away from the true love of Christ and the interests of his kingdom. Where will it all end.

—Jesuitism is just now attracting considerable public attention since a prominent member of the order has publicly defended it and branded its opponents as liars. In this connection Gen. T. M. Harris, in the United Presbyterian, revives a pertinent incident to show that the Jesuits have an indirect but effectual method of laying our national and municipal treasuries under tribute. "A striking example of this," he says, "is seen in Macon, Georgia, a city of 30,000 inhabitants, one-tenth only of them Catholics, but where the Jesuits, by their cunning diplomacy, were able to get the city council to donate to them forty-four acres of land adjoining the city, worth $100,000, for a Jesuit college, and seven acres in the city for a convent school. This was from the council only a gift; but to the Protestant population of that city it was a robbery."

THE PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

Bro. Stoddard requests that all who receive bills advertising this convention will put them up in their postoffices, have them printed in their local newspapers, and circulate them among their friends. Get as many out as possible.

FAITH OF OUR FATHERS.

Faith of our fathers! living still
In spite of dungeon, fire and sword;
Oh, how our hearts beat high with joy
Whene'er we hear that glorious word:
Faith of our fathers! holy faith!
We will be true to thee till death!

Our fathers, chained in prisons dark,
Were still in heart and conscience free;
How sweet would be their children's fate,
If they, like them, could die for thee!
Faith of our fathers! holy faith!
We will be true to thee till death!

Faith of our fathers! we will love
Both friend and foe in all our strife:
And preach thee, too, as love knows how,
By kindly words and virtuous life:
Faith of our fathers! holy faith!
We will be true to thee till death!

HIRAM GOFF, A SHOEMAKER.

I came across, the other day, a little book, out of which I read a few sentences. I read the title-page and it was this: "Hiram Goff, a Shoemaker by the Grace of God." Then I read the last page, and it was stated that when this man died they put on his tombstone that which he had requested, "Hiram Goff, a Shoemaker by the Grace of God." I looked to see what was in the middle of the book, and I read this, that a young stripling of a minister, who had just come to be pastor in the town, went down to talk to Hiram because he had heard that he was a spiritual man, and he said: "Mr. Goff," and Mr. Goff said: "Don't call me Mr. Goff; call me Hiram." "Well, Hiram," said the minister, "I have come to talk with you about the things of God, and I am very glad that a man can be in a humble occupation and yet be a godly man." The shoemaker stopped and looked up at him and said: "Don't call this occupation humble." The minister thought he had made a mistake and said: "Excuse me, I didn't mean to reflect on what you do for a living." The man replied: "You didn't hurt me, but I was afraid you might hurt the Lord Jesus Christ. I believe the making of that shoe is just as holy a thing as your making a sermon. I believe that, when I come to stand before the throne of God, he is going to say: 'What kind of shoes did you make on earth?' And he might pick out this very pair in order to let me look at them in the blazing light of the great white throne; and he is going to say to you: 'What kind of sermons did you make?' and you will have to show him one of your sermons. Now, if I made better shoes than you made sermons, I will have a better place in the kingdom of God. From the depths of my soul I believe that."—Rev. B. Fay Mills.

QUIET RESTING PLACES.

The need of rest is manifest to every weary laborer. To meet this need God has provided some quiet resting places in the midst of our days, where we can lay down our burdens and rest awhile. Human nature would break down and our intellect fail us if we had to go on unceasingly under the pressure of care and toil. Night brings rest. We leave our task at the shop or the desk, and go to our homes. Sleep, sweet restorer, balmy sleep, in a peculiar, mysterious way replenishes the forces of nature, and we are thus ready for another day and its duties. The Sabbath is, or should be, another quiet resting place. It was made for man. The Lord of the Sabbath has purposed that we should lay aside all the care and labor of the week and spend the day in such a way that when the day of labor comes we shall be refreshed and invigorated for our work. We advocate the quiet rest and service of the Puritan Sabbath. What a contrast to the Sabbath of to-day!

Then, too, some find seasons of rest when they can leave their work and go away. We think it well that a vacation should be taken. In this hurrying time it is needed. But we should remember that these times of rest are not the object of our life. They are like oases in the journey. They cheer and strengthen the traveler, and thus aid him in his journey to the home land.

One has said: "Life is serious. It is full of responsibility. One cannot waste an hour of it without sin. It must be put to its best possible use. Rest is never, therefore, an object in life—we do not live to rest; or if we do, we fail to grasp life's meaning. Rest is not an end, but a means. We do not live to rest; we rest to live. We take rest that we may live better, more energetically, more powerfully, more intensely. We sleep after an exhausting day that we may be fresh and strong tomorrow. We spend our Sabbaths in such rest from toil, and such spiritual exercises as shall make us ready for another week of service. We take vacations, not merely to have a good time, but to renew our stock of vitality."

These resting places are also typical; especially is the Sabbath "a type of the deep rest yet to come, when earth's sins are swept away and creation itself is restored to holiness and the liberty of the sons of God." So wrote A. A. Bonar. He also said: "The sin of Israel lay in their manner of keeping Sabbath-days and Sabbath years. Their God was not honored; they did not give spiritual service. They also turned the observance of the seasons appointed into times of pleasure-riding in their chariots, probably, and giving themselves to amusements.... Alas! our land seems near its day of doom! Incessant movement of men over its breadth and length! Where is the rest? But so it shall be as the time draws near wherein the Sabbath of earth shall arrive, when the disturbers of its rest are brought to silence."—Messiah's Herald.

TWO MILLIONAIRES.

I met them to-day, but not in the same place. One of them was in a private parlor in a fashionable hotel. As he was an old acquaintance, we had a long and confidential conversation. He told me of his early struggles after he left the school where we were fellow-students—of his speculations, disappointments, and final sweep. He said: "You know, Obadiah, how poor our folks were. I was disgusted with poverty and determined to be rich. I went to California, worked in the placers, and saved my dust until I had enough to go prospecting. I staked out several claims, and thought I had 'struck it rich,' again and again. But the ore failed to pan out as I expected. At last, however, I did get on a quartz ledge that went five hundred to the ton. I worked it deep enough to make a good show; then I organized a company and put the stock on the market. While it was booming I sold out, and invested all that I had made in government bonds. Here they are. I brought them from my box in the safe deposit vault to cut off the coupons. They amount to a round million, and give me an income of forty thousand a year. I don't own a foot of real estate, or any kind of property. I have just this package of bonds (taking it out of his bosom), so you see I am free from care. My bonds are safe in the vault, and whenever I want any ready cash I have only to go and cut off coupons."

"But," I said, "that bundle of paper in your bosom, which you say makes you a millionaire, has no intrinsic value. Those bonds are only promises. Suppose the signer of them should fail?"

"Why, man, they are United States bonds. The faith of the government is pledged for their redemption. They are better than gold or silver. My only fear is that the government may pay them at maturity. I would be glad to have them run as long as I live."

"So you are a millionaire by faith," I said. "You don't see your real wealth, or handle it, but only pieces of paper that represent it."

"Yes, that is so; and while those pieces of paper represent the wealth and honor of the best government in the world, I am satisfied."

The other millionaire I found in the county poorhouse. I used to know him, too, in former times. He was a good boy at school. He grew up a bad man. But "whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth," and this old friend had a succession of financial disappointments, followed by broken health, until he was compelled to go to the pauper's home. He, of course, was without lands or material wealth of any kind, and yet he had, like the man in the hotel, a bundle of promises. As I sat by him in his narrow chamber, he took from under his pillow a well-worn Bible. He held it up in his thin, trembling hand, and said: "Obadiah, people call me a pauper, but I am worth millions. Why, in this book, which I sometimes think God has written expressly for me, there are more than three thousand 'exceeding great and precious promises.' I wouldn't exchange one of them for a $50,000 government bond. The bond I would have to leave in a few years at furthest; but these promises I shall take with me when I die, and claim them in the land where there is no more death. They are the bonds of Him who owns, not only the earth, but all the stars in the sky, and all the worlds that roll around them."

As I walked slowly home after that second interview, and thought over the events of the day, I concluded that I would rather be in the place of the millionaire in the poorhouse than in that of the millionaire in the Palace Hotel. Both are rich in faith; but the basis of the confidence in one case is human, and in the other divine. I am an enthusiastic patriot. I believe that our government is the best on the earth, but I would rather trust God, yes, a thousand times rather, than it. His wealth is boundless, his power is limitless, his truth is immutable, and his love is infinite.—Interior.

CHILD-STORIES.

A child of many prayers was early encouraged to express his desires to God, in his own simple language. Sick or suffering animals shared in his petitions. "Please, God, make my rabbit well," was one of his tender requests. He felt great pity for a cripple, who came to the house, and at night supplicated his Father in heaven, for "the poor, old man, with only but one leg."

A touching faith mingled with his heart's orisons. Being once in pain, he rose from his bed, and kneeled by that of his mother, beseeching God to relieve him. Immediately after he reached to her his little hand, saying, "feel pulse; —better now."

Once, during the absence of his father, she requested a visitant to lead in the devotions of the family, when the child, seated in his little chair, looked up, and repeated with solemnity:

"Approach, my soul, the mercy-seat,
Where Jesus answers prayer,
And humbly fall before his feet,
For none can perish there."

At the age of four he was smitten with fatal sickness. His sufferings were great, but his expressions of affection for those he loved, and of gratitude to all who rendered him any service, were sweet and constant. To the question if he would like to go to his Saviour, he ever replied in the affirmative.

When the dimness of death settled upon his beautiful eyes, he exclaimed:

"Bring a light! I cannot see my sweet mamma."

Reaching his hand after her, it rested upon her face, which was bent over his pillow. Hitherto, he had made many affecting appeals, in his pain.

"Help me! Can't any of you help me?" Now that solicitude was past. The wishful look faded into an admiring and solemn wonder, and he said with a beaming countenance:

"I love God. How beautiful it looks up there!"

Sweet, and glorious parting words! never to be forgotten by those who heard them.

Once more he spoke to his mother:

"Sing to me, what you sing in church."

And as she controlled her grief, that she might lull his death-pangs with the hymn he loved, he fondly laid his lamb-like head upon her shoulder, and murmured his last, low tones,

"Come, mamma, let us go to sleep."

And he slept in Jesus.

The beautiful daughter of a clergyman, among the Green Mountains, when about five years old, was delighted at the birth of a baby-sister. In the fullness of the new affection, she desired to give it her own name. The desire seemed to amount to a passion.

"O, name her after me! name her after me!"

To the reasoning of her parents, she repeatedly replied:

"I sha'n't want my own name."

She was grieved at the refusal, but at length coincided in a substitute, about whose choice she was consulted. On the day appointed for the baptism, she was taken so violently ill, that the rite was deferred. Scarcely a fortnight had elapsed from the day in which she made the singular assertion,—that "she should not want her own name,"—ere she departed to receive a new name, which as yet we know not.

It was on the third of August, 1806, surrounded by the glories of summer, that this lovely heart-flower faded. In the faintness and languor of death, she suddenly spoke with a glad, clear voice:

"Oh, see, up there, those little children—those good little children. I see them, I see them."

And so, she joined the angel throng. The mourning father baptized the cherished infant by its selected name of Henrietta, to which, with gushing tears, was added that of Anna Lorraine, so prophetically tendered and possessed by the engaging child who was no longer his own, having risen to the family who die no more. Permit me to add, that she who bore that sacred name, afterward, as a missionary of the cross in Constantinople, served faithfully the cause of that Redeemer whom, in life's blossoming season, she had chosen as her patron.

DOMESTIC SERVICE AS VIEWED BY DOMESTICS.

We are often surprised that young girls of the laboring classes consider work in a shop or factory so infinitely preferable to domestic service, and we frequently hear ladies enumerating the privileges granted to their servants and wondering at the perversity of girls who continue to prefer labor of some other kind, albeit harder and more poorly paid, to household service. The perversity referred to is so widespread that it is hardly possible to consider it entirely groundless and unreasonable. Where there is so much smoke we feel sure there must be some fire.

I was first led to consider this subject from the servant's point of view by what I saw and heard at a lunch party not long ago. The guests were mostly ladies of wealth and position, and as we gathered after lunch on the spacious piazza of our hostess's seaside cottage the conversation turned upon the subject of servants. Many of these ladies were members of churches and active in benevolent work, but the bitterness shown by them in discussing this subject was surprising. Various ones gave accounts of experiences with servants which showed their ingratitude, inconsiderateness and deceitfulness, and the opinion seemed to be unanimous that there was no such thing as gratitude or reliability to be expected from servants. During this conversation I could not help suspecting that servants of the house might often be within earshot, and I fancied our hostess looked uneasy, and once or twice she attempted to turn the conversation to safer subjects, but in vain.

I am aware that these ladies furnish only one type of mistress, and I could cite many instances of others who are always considerate of those in their service. But, after all, it seems to me that they are the exception, and that mistresses too often look upon their servants as natural enemies, and make it their aim to get as much as they can out of them, forgetting that they are human beings entitled to sympathy and consideration from those who employ them. Are they entirely to blame if, finding themselves in an atmosphere of hard criticism, they lose interest in their work and become defiant and impertinent?

Our American girls are apt to think it a degradation to become household servants. Very foolish of them, we say, and shows weakness of intellect and character. Let us ask ourselves how many of us have the strength of character to withstand the general trend of public opinion about us? I knew a nice American girl who had spent her life in a small country village and had taken her place as an equal among the young girls of the neighborhood, although she was "hired help," according to country parlance. She was engaged by a lady who was spending the summer in the village to go back to the city with her as nurse to her two small children. She loved the care of children and was very happy in her new life. Her mistress took her to the church which she attended, introduced her to the young people of the Christian Endeavor Society, of which she became a member, and for a time all went well and happily.

But little by little there came a change. The young people of the church, who had supposed her to be a friend of Mrs. C.'s, discovered that she was only a nursemaid in Mrs. C.'s employ, and began to show in many ways that they no longer cared to associate with her upon equal terms, even in Christian work. She began to feel the same chilling atmosphere in the Sunday-school class which she had joined, and little by little she gave up going to any of the church gatherings where she had been made to feel so comfortable. I wish I might add that this is only a fancy sketch, but, unfortunately, the facts are quite true.

In the light of these facts, I think it must be conceded that there are serious drawbacks to domestic service, and that a truer, more practical Christianity is the only possible solution of the perplexing questions that arise in connection with it.—Susan Monroe Stowe, in the Congregationalist.

STRIKE HARD!

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Strike hard! what time the tide of battle rageth,
And wild the notes of drum and bugle swell;
Aim well! strike hard! His is the war we wageth,
And every blow shall tell.

Smite hard! what time the fiery sparks are flying,
Thy blows resound, clear as a morning bell;
What! though the field be strewn with dead and dying!
Strike! every blow shall tell.

Smite well! strike hard! our bread upon the waters,
Like saints of old, upon the waves we cast.
He knows, the while, oh, striving sons and daughters,
Your blows fall thick and fast.

From that vast temple, boundless as our wonder,
Whose towers uprise, bright as the noon-day sun,
He marks our toil; his voice, like living thunder,
Shall cheer his people on.

God's hand is on the lever; our endeavor
Glows with his love along this thorny track;
And long as seas shall roar and sunbeams quiver,
He'll send his lightnings back.

TEMPERANCE.

A TEMPERANCE SERMON.

One of the most eloquent temperance sermons I ever heard—or rather, saw—preached was delivered some ten years ago on the deck of a propeller sailing "to the east'ard," out of the port of New York. The pulpit was a forecastle. The audience was so much of the ship's company as happened to be on deck. The time was on towards midnight of a dark night. The music was the weary "thump, thump, thump," of the screw lashing the sullen waters. The text was that ancient challenge, "Who hath woe? Who hath sorrow? They that tarry long at the wine." The preacher was the shattered wreck of a young man. His inspiration was delirium tremens. The most telling argument of his discourse was a quick, fatal plunge into the dark and angry waters of Long Island Sound.

There was no closing prayer, no benediction, no gentle breathing "Go in peace!" It was awful. The event sickened us all. I had been in conversation with that very man but three-quarters of an hour previous to his last, mad leap. Sauntering forward, and engaging in a conversation with several individuals, which soon took a religious turn, my attention was directed to a young fellow who gave every evidence of having been a hard drinker, and whose speech was even then somewhat incoherent. We talked awhile in the gloom just abaft the forecastle. One remark my new acquaintance then made I distinctly recall: "I don't suppose that there is a harder drinker in all Portland than I am!" What I may have said in remonstrance on the young man's mad course I cannot now recall. I learned that he had a mother in Portland who was waiting his return, and doubtless,—mothers have that way ofttimes, God bless them,—praying for her absent boy.

It was less than an hour after our conversation just described when there sounded sharply on the night air the clang of the engine-room gong, and instantly in obedience to the signal from the pilot-house the engine stopped. Everybody on deck ran forward, to be greeted by the startling news, "Man overboard!" a cry which once heard at sea lives ever afterward vividly in the memory.

As soon as possible the gathered headway of the steamer was checked. Quickly a boat was swung out-board and lowered away from the davits. "Better take a lantern with you!" calls out the captain, anxious lest the boat should be run down in the darkness by a Sound steamer whose lights showed her to be coming up behind. "Never mind us!" the plucky mate in charge, bent on saving life, replied, as the falls were unhooked and the boat dropped away astern.

Moment after moment of anxious suspense went by while the rescuing party searched the face of the gloomy deep, and the excited passengers rehearsed among themselves the particulars of the strange, sad event. It appeared that the victim was the young man with whom I had had the conversation above referred to; and that the case was one of suicide under the devilish spur and impulse of strong drink. A ship's officer who happened to be in the pilot house at the time told how he had suddenly seen an apparition of a figure on the forecastle, had noticed something strange in the man's actions, but before any orders could be given to some of the hands to secure him, he had plunged desparately off the port bow into the sea.

No shout of satisfaction at accomplished rescue came back from the searching party astern. Evidently the wretched man had sunk like lead in the waters. After a fruitless search the boat returned, was hauled up and stowed inboard; the screw began to revolve again, and we with sickened and saddened hearts were off, leaving the form of the mad suicide confined there in Long Island Sound, with a pitch dark night for his pall.

The temperance sermon had been preached, and the service of testimony was over. It was awful. It was a thing to remember all one's life. It was a thing to tell to others as a warning for their friends' sakes, if not for themselves, as I am doing now. The good Book says of bad men: "The way of the transgressor is hard;" and "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness." Isn't it so?—C. A. S. Dwight, in Sailors' Magazine.

A TRUE REPUBLIC DEFINED.

Under this license system, of what practical value are inherent, inalienable rights of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness, to secure which, and the protection of property, governments are instituted?

Does not the making of widows and orphans require the life of husband and father?

Is a man in becoming a drunken, pauperized, profligate sot, a terror to his family and neighbors—as he sinks lower and lower in the scale of manhood until all self-respect and the respect of his friends are lost, and death comes finally to end his miserable existence in this world—is such a man in the pursuit of happiness and in the enjoyment of his other inherent and inalienable rights?

Are his wife and children during his downward course—then, his widow and orphans—are they in the pursuit of happiness, and in the enjoymcnt of their other inherent and inalienable rights?

Would support from the saloon-keepers who caused the degradation and death of husband and father—would their support, were this part of the law enforceable—would it, I ask, recompense the widow and orphans for the injuries sustained?

Could the money of these saloon-keepers, were this part of the law enforceable—could it make good the damages the community sustained in the wrecking of a citizen?

No! No! A thousand times NO! Oh, the sorrows, the pains, the inexpressible pangs of suffering, the moral blight, this awful traffic brings! There is no recompensing, there is no making good for such injuries, for such damages.

Think, think, then of the tens upon tens of thousands, aye, a hundred thousand and more, of deaths yearly in this country alone which the liquor traffic causes!

"Land of the brave, and home of the free" are we called in song and story.

While permitting these wrongs, are we brave? Are we free?

Answer, Nebraska voter, answer through the ballots you shall cast at the next and subsequent elections.—Nebraska New Republic.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Abraham tried.—vs. 1, 2. It should be explained at the outset of this lesson that the word "tempt" is here used in the sense of "try" or test, as workmen try an iron girder to see if it is strong enough to bear the weight that is going to come upon it. In James 1: 13, we read that "God cannot be tempted of evil, neither doth he tempt any man." "After these things." Abraham had already passed through repeated trials of his faith, but God saw that it would bear yet more and so he proceeded to test it yet farther, and to a degree which makes him the grandest example of faith in God known in human history. "Behold, here am I." This should be our answer to every call of God. "Here I am; ready to do whatever is thy will; ready to go on any errand that thou biddest." Let us hold ourselves in such an attitude, so free from entangling alliances with the world, that we shall be like Abraham and the worthies of old—God's minute-men, ready for duty as soon as the summons comes. "Thine only son . . . . whom thou lovest." Poignant indeed must have been the anguish of the father's heart. That the place selected was distant three days' journey could have been but an aggravation of his grief, by giving him time to realize the full depths of the sacrifice he was called to make. It is the slow martyrdoms which try faith.

2. Abraham's journey.—vs. 3–5. "Abraham rose up early in the morning." Orientals travel in the early part of the day, and rest at noon; but we can easily imagine another reason why Abraham started off, probably before the first streak of dawn had appeared in the east. Martyrs have slept undisturbed the night before their execution, but little sleep must have visited Abraham's eyes with the thought continually in his mind of what he would be required to do on the morrow. But we do not read of the least delay or hesitation. Deliberately he made all the preparation needed, and went on his sad journey till, "on the third day, Abraham lifted up his eyes and saw the place afar off." He left his two servants behind for obvious reasons, but one is irresistibly reminded throughout of the resemblance to that divine Sacrifice, which so many centuries after was to be offered for the sins of the world, in our Lord's commands to his three disciples: "Sit ye here while I go and pray yonder."

3. Isaac's obedience.—vs. 6–9. "And laid it upon Isaac his son." So our Lord bore his cross up the slope of Calvary. The points which make the offering up of Isaac the clearest type of Christ's sufferings and death which Old Testament history gives us, grows more marked at every step. Abraham must have cherished a trembling hope that God would spare his father's heart the actual sacrifice, or that, if it was really required of him, his son would be restored alive; for how else could the promises, only to be fulfilled through him, ever be realized? It is evident, by his answer to Isaac's innocent question, "Where is the lamb for a burnt-offering?" that he could not bring himself to tell his son that he himself was to be the victim until they came to the place of sacrifice. Here, in the meek, unmurmuring obedience of Isaac, we come to perhaps the strongest point of resemblance to our Lord. As he was nailed to the cross, so Isaac was bound on the altar. Though he did not suffer actual death, he must have felt all its bitterness, with the additional pang which made so large a part of our Saviour's sufferings at his crucifixion:—that it was inflicted by a Father's hand.

4. The lamb found.—vs. 10–13. "Lay not thine hand upon the lad." Says Henry, in commenting on this passage, 'Our creature comforts are most likely to be continued to us when we are most willing to resign them to God's will." The reason is plain to see. God takes no pleasure in depriving us of the good things of life, or those more precious treasures, the hearts in which we are enshrined, that beat as one with ours, and which to lose from our embrace is more bitter than death itself. Abraham had, so far as will and purpose went, actually offered up his son. The literal sacrifice was not needed. Having borne this supreme strain, his faith and obedience might be trusted to bear any other that could come upon it. Abraham's reply to Isaac, that "God would provide himself a lamb," was a prophecy of the Lamb of God offered up in our stead. We may learn from this lesson: (1.) That God will not try us above what we are able to bear. Unless we have Abraham's faith, we need not expect a trial like Abraham's; but if we are truly God's children we may be sure that he will try us as far as we are able to endure. (2.) God does not want our possessions; only the love which is tested when he asks us to give them up. If the young ruler had been ready to give up everything for the Lord, he might not have been required to part with all he had, or our Saviour's promise of a "hundred fold more in this time" would have been fulfilled. (3.) God's tried and tested ones are his precious jewels. Worldly people may often seem to pass through life without any trials. But the lapidary never takes the pains to cut and polish common pebbles. Which would we rather be; a pebble (pretty perhaps, but valueless), or a diamond in the King's crown?

LITERATURE.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The contents of the February (Midwinter) number of the Century Magazine are, as usual, marked by variety and standard quality, both of letter-press and illustration. They are as follows: Laurens Alma-Tadema, the modern Dutch painter, with full-page portrait, by Ellen Gosse; The Arrival of the Mail, by George W. Edwards; Cœur D'Alene, the first of a new mining story, by Mary Hallock Foote; Criticism and Culture, by Jas. Russell Lowell; The Tramp at Home, by Josiah Flynt; Le Rossignol, by Henry Tyrrell; A Woman, by Louis Loeb; A Romance of the Faith, by Herbert D. Ward; Two Hitherto Unpublished Portraits of Washington (with reproductions of them), by H. S. Stabler and Ella B. Washington; A Friend, by Stuart Stern; Pudd'nhead Wilson (3), by Mark Twain; Mr. Ebenezer Bull's Investment, by Richard M. Martin; Irish Songs, by Jennie E. T. Dowe; Lincoln's Place in History, by John C. Adams; Lincoln's Gettysburgh Address (with fac similes of the original manuscripts), by John G. Nicolay; The Myth of Land-bill Allen, by Washington Gladden; A Study of Indian Music (with specimens), by Jno. C. Fillmore; The Real Stonewall Jackson, by Gen. D. H. Hill; Uncontrolled, by Ella Wheeler Wilcox; and the usual departments, editorial, etc. New York: The Century Co. Price, 35 cents.

Few magazines appeal to the admiration of general readers with more of literary and pictorial attractions, variety and timeliness than the Review of Reviews. The February number is decidedly a fine one. The frontispiece represents President Dole and his Hawaiian Cabinet. The Progress of the World embraces forty-one topics of public interest; the Leading Articles of the Month (from current periodicals), fifty-five other subjects, and both are freely illustrated with portraits. Special contributions are: Our New National Wonder land, illustrated, by Carl Snyder; A Character Sketch of the late John Tyndall, with portrait by Grant Allen; Relief Measures in American Cities, by Albert Shaw; together with Current History in Caricature, Record of Current Events, Reviews, etc. Published at 13 Astor Place, New York City. Price, 25 cents. It meets all the conditions of a cheap and popular periodical.

The Cosmopolitan for February presents many claims for public favor, with its ordinary attractions somewhat emphasized. Its contents, enriched by fine engravings, are as follows: A Rejected Manuscript, by A. S. Hardy; The Designing and Building of a War-ship, by W. A. Dobson; Hafiz, a poem, by Sir Edward Arnold; Indian War and Warriors, by Elaine G. Eastman; Aspects and Impressions of a Plutocratic City, by W. D. Howells; Ghosts, a poem, by Graham R. Tomson; The Great Naval Fight between the Meloban and the Pentheroy, by James Creelman; The Beggars, a poem, by William Young; The Origin of Thought, by Armando P. Valdes; Gliding Flight, by L. P. Mouillard; The Saga of Eric, the Red, by H. H. Boyesen; God's Will and Human Happiness, by St. George Mivart; Perfume Worship in All Ages, by Esther Singleton; The Disappearance Syndicate, by T. C. Crawford; In the World of Art and Letters, and The Progress of Science. Published in New York City. Price, 15 cents.

—The discussion of current economic questions in the Social Economist for February is calculated to impress thoughtful readers with the candor and intelligence that distinguish its contents. The subjects presented take the following range: The Delusion About Prices; A "Revenue Only" Tariff Unconstitutional; What Shall We Do With The Unemployed? The Decline in Railway Values; Colorado's Mistake About Silver; The Crisis and Foreign Investors; The French Element in American Population; Thirty years under Bismarck's Frown, and Tenement Houses and Their Tenants. The Editorial Crucible of this magazine, as usual, is replete with lively comment. While all readers may not always endorse the opinions expressed by the various writers in the Social Economist, they will be sure to find much of interest in the subjects of which they treat. Published at 34 Union Square, New York City. Price, 25 cents.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—There are twenty-two German Baptist churches in Wisconsin, with an aggregate membership of 1,562. There were 218 additions to these churches the past year. They are, indeed, a very benevolent people, for their contributions last year amounted to nearly $20,000; the value of their church property has grown to about $50,000. Their mission work in this State is done directly through the American Baptist Home Mission Society.

CHURCH UNION.

The questions of church union and co-operation are of living interest to all Christians. The union of the Baptists and the Disciples of Christ; the union of the Northern and Southern Presbyterian churches; the co-operation of the different bodies of Lutherans, are problems now in some form before these different denominations. What has been called a precedent step toward union between the Presbyterian churches North and South, was the appointment of committees by these two bodies for the purpose of harmonizing their work for the Negroes in the South. These committees recently met at Birmingham, Ala., and the discussion of the question of ultimate union has received a fresh impulse. The Lutherans have held a joint committee meeting to formulate a plan of co-operation without a surrender or compromise of the doctrinal position of either sect. All these efforts toward union we believe to be proper.—Christian Reformer.

FOREIGN MISSIONS.

—Canon Scott Robertson's twenty-second annual summary of British contributions for the propagation of the Gospel in foreign parts shows that for the financial year 1892 the total sum voluntarily contributed to the numerous missionary societies in the British Isles was £1,363,153. The channels selected by the donors are thus classified: Church of England societies, £584,615; joint societies of Churchmen and Nonconformists, £204,655; Nonconformist societies in England and Wales, £354,396; Presbyterian societies in Scotland and Ireland, £207,327; Roman Catholic societies, £12,160.

LUTHERAN.

—An effort is to be made by the German Lutheran Synod of Iowa, to do work among the Jews of Chicago.

—The minutes of District Synods of the General Synod show the following statistics: Synod of Southern Illinois, 7 ministers, 19 congregations and 1,081 members; Synod of Kansas, 43 ministers, 43 congregations and 7,282 members; Miami Synod, 41 ministers, 45 congregations and 4,328 members; Pittsburgh Synod, 55 ministers, 86 congregations and 8,686 members.

SALVATION ARMY.

—The Salvation Army has the following record as to places of useful work for its twenty-eight years of life: 4,397 mission stations; 74 homes of rest where officers go whose health is broken down; 66 training schools for the training of officers; 64 slum posts; 49 rescue homes for fallen women; 12 prison gate homes; 52 food and shelter depots; 34 factories and employment offices and 5 farm colonies.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—Fishing on Sunday is condemned as illegal by the appellate court of New York, on the ground that the Christian Sabbath is one of the civil institutions of the State.

—A bill has been introduced in the South Carolina legislature to prohibit the running of mail or railway trains on the Sabbath on any lines of railway within the State.

—No fewer than 320 tablets have recently been recovered in Palestine and Arabia, all throwing more or less light on contested portions of Scripture. The tablets are nearly 4,000 years old.

—Bishop Crowther, the ex-slave and bishop of the Niger, died some time ago, and Rev. Joseph Sidney Hill was appointed his successor. Word is received of the death of Bishop Hill and his wife.

—The first week of April is the time set apart by the American Sabbath Union, by agreement with some of the churches, as a time of special prayer for and thought upon the observance of the Lord's Day. It requests of the pulpits a sermon upon the subject and such other measures for awakening an interest as may seem appropriate. The custom of making certain truths prominent by devoting a special season of observance to them, could not find a fitter subject.

HOME AND HEALTH.

(From the Vanguard.)

It is not so much what we eat, as the appetite and digestion that makes a meal enjoyable.

God esteems human bodies so highly that he makes them the temples of the Holy Ghost. He will resurrect their very dust from the realms of death. Would they not be fitter shrines for the Spirit, if purged and healed from every species of sickness by the power of our God?

Do not neglect to air bedrooms and sitting rooms every day. In the coldest weather this is necessary to have the air pure, and when the rooms are constantly used they should be frequently aired by opening windows a few moments. Cold air may be very bad, but out-of-door air is always better than that inside.

The rich, with well-heated rooms, bath-rooms and plentiful water supplies have no excuse for personal uncleanliness. Yet we fear many of them neglect the daily bath, and make no use of their privileges. The poor have often great difficulties in the way of frequent bathing. But almost everybody can find a way to bathe often enough to keep the skin clean and active if they will take the trouble,

We notice the following in an exchange which should be a warning to wearers of the deadly corset: "Frankie Simmons, an inmate of Sadie Hodge's house, recently died in a cutter while riding with her employer. The Hodge woman spoke to Miss Simmons but she did not answer. She reined her horse at a drug store and called for assistance, and the girl whose head had fallen back, was taken into the store where she soon ceased to breathe. An autopsy was held, and her disease pronounced paralysis of the heart, and her heart was, strange to say, pronounced perfectly healthy. The paralysis was the effect of pressure on the heart due to wearing corsets. Her heart, lungs, liver and stomach were crowded into an abnormally small place." No doubt many sudden deaths come from similar causes.

Hall's Hair Renewer renders the hair lustrous and silken, gives it an even color, and enables women to put it up in great variety of styles.

United Presbyterians among our readers will be glad to learn that the Midland of Omaha is about to remove to Chicago. This will answer the most common and seemingly only objection to it—"too far west." The Midland is newsy, spicy and sound, liberal and loyal and patriotic and progressive; it excels in giving the news of its own denomination, in supporting the reforms of the day and in advocating home missions. Send for a free sample copy. Address the Midland Publishing Co. Its regular price is $1.50, but to one of our old subscribers who becomes a new subscriber to the Midland, both papers will be sent by us for $2.50. To one who becomes a new subscriber to both, the Cynosure and Midland, the papers will cost for one year ylsn $2.00. Address, Christian Cynou,eor 221 W. Madison street.

Talks to Sunday-School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Teloscope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

THE GREATEST THING IN THE WORLD.

The Perfected Life;

THE GREATEST NEED IN THE WORLD.

Both by Prof. Henry Drummond. Bound in chaste white vellum paper, each 20 cts.

These are not to be judged by the size, unless rubies are counted for the weight thereof. The first has been very largely circulated, the second is now only just published and deserves the same wide reading—both are gems such as are only found at rare intervals. If you have not read them, do so at once, you will be a better man or woman for the reading.

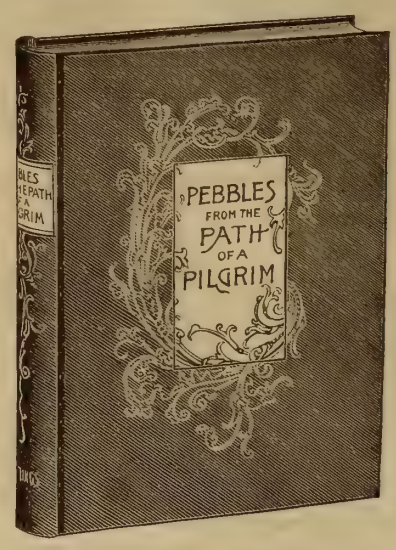
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.

Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out far dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' aid 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the seeret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches with an earnestness born of conviction.

FARM NOTES.

WINTER SUGGESTIONS.

There is always plenty to do on the farm, but much of the winter's work should be "head work," and thus save labor and money the following seasons. Do you keep a full account of your business? If not, now is a good time to study up some system that suits you best. There are many simple systems, one of which I will give on application. There is much satisfaction in keeping a full account of each industry on the farm, and then you can readily tell where your profit is.

Now is a good time to experiment on feeding poultry, pigs, and especially the milch cows. It costs but little to experiment, and by so doing we will undoubtedly be able to feed at a greater profit. Your dairy equipment is not complete without scales and milk tests. Cull out the poor cows at once, for they eat up the profits. The silo is almost an indispensible adjunct to the dairy. Study it up, and now is a good time to build one.

Lay your plans, as far as possible, for your spring work, so as to begin with the season. If you have not yet shelled your seed corn, do not defer longer, for the damp weather in February may spoil it. Now is the time to clean up the seed grain, and don't neglect to repair the broken machinery.—George W. Hackett, in the N. Y. Witness.

SABBATH ON THE FARM.

Mrs. Jeannie Crosby writes to the New York Witness: "I lived on a farm with my husband and four little ones. We kept two hired men, which made a family of eight. On Sunday morning after breakfast, which was always an hour later on that day, the children made the beds, and did a little necessary work, after which they put on their best dresses and came into the sitting room at half past ten, when we held a regular church service. The children each had their Sunday to play their hymns on the organ, and were allowed to make their own selections. Their father read the Bible and made a few comments on the chapter. It was usually twelve o'clock when our little service ended, and until dinner time which was at one, I allowed the children to play quietly. In the afternoon, weather permitting, my husband and I would take them for a walk, the children picking flowers and bringing them to us, reciting appropriate verses of Scripture which they had been preparing during the week. After tea, we all again assembled in the sitting room and had what I call an open prayer meeting. We sang hymns, read a Psalm alternately, and then each one rose, and gave a short testimony. After this, we knelt, and one after the other prayed aloud. Though I live in the city now, and have the advantage of the biggest churches and finest preachers, still my heart goes out to those old days on the farm."

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,

BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by persuing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FIVE FAMOUS ETCHINGS.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem river at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of falling waters and spray.

No. 3—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4—"999 and the DeWitt Clinton." The Famous Empire State Express Engine "999" which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "DeWitt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railroad science in the past fifty years.

No. 5—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark St., Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address, postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to Geo. H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

"Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup for Children Teething" softens the gums, reduces inflammation, allays pain and cures wind colic. 25c a bottle.

PENNSYLVANIA ANNUAL ANTI-SECRECY MEETING.

To the Friends of the Cause of Anti-secrecy in Pennsylvania:—You are requested to assemble in the First United Presbyterian church, corner of Broad and Lombard streets, in the city of Philadelphia, on Monday and Tuesday, February 26 and 27, to hear reports and discuss matters that pertain to the Master's cause as they stand related to the National Christian Association and its work.

The opening session will be on Monday, February 26, at 7:30 P. M.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard, Field Secretary, will arrange and report program, with the advice of friends in Philadelphia.

Perils are imminent—the times auspicious. Let prayer be made for the presence and blessing of the Master of assemblies. Let there be a full rally of godly, praying people, male and female. Wise men will be glad to confer and know what "Israel ought to do" to turn back the tide of this flood which the dragon has sent out to destroy the church and the nation.

Reformers should be aroused!

Statesmen should be warned!

Victims should be saved from this all-desolating flood!

Let this convention inaugurate a new era of activity, zeal and success.

S. COLLINS, Pres.
J. S. T. MILLIGAN, Cor. Sec'y.
Beaver, Pa., Jan. 12, 1894.

The Pennsylvania State Anti-secreey Convention, the call and program of which are respectively printed on this and the ninth pages of to-day's issue, receives new interest from the letter of Bro. W. B. Stoddard, on page five. He writes encouragingly, and feelingly appeals to our friends to attend as numerously as possible, and to urge the attendance of others. The program, corrected to date, is highly attractive, and there is good promise (D. V.) of a large and successful gathering. Those who expect to attend should write at once to Bro. Stoddard, to secure entertainment.

The effort of the Knights of Labor to enjoin Secretary Carlisle's proposed issue of Government bonds, on the ground that it was an unnecessary and illegal measure, experienced entire defeat in Judge Cox's court at Washington. The application was denied, and the Secretary's right to issue the bonds was confirmed. The legal phase of the transaction having been thus settled, it can only become a disturbing element in national politics.

By the failure of a bank at Indianapolis, it is announced, the widow of Vice-President Schuyler Colfax has been left penniless in her advanced years, and an appeal has been made to Odd-fellows to raise money for her support. Mr. Colfax, it will be remembered, was the founder of the Rebekah degree in that order, and the author of its ritual. It would seem to be the positive duty of the order to secure her against the ills of poverty, and make her comfortable for life.

President Eliot of Cambridge University, who has attracted no little disrespectful comment by his endorsement of the Mormons and the support of secret societies in colleges, in his recent annual report referred to college athletics, and proposed the following radical changes: That no freshmen shall be allowed to participate in any intercollegiate event. That nobody be allowed to compete more than one year in any line of intercollegiate athletics. That intercollegiate contests take place but once in two years. His opposition to intercollegiate athletics has been known for several months, but his recent expressions have created general indignation, and a mass meeting to protest against his position is proposed. He seems to prefer more study and less unnecessary "bodily exercise," which "profiteth little."

The movement in Great Britain to abolish the House of Lords, or to deprive it of its influence in thwarting the plans of the people, is revived under the recent action of the Lords in defeating three popular measures advanced in the House of Commons. The rejection of the Home Rule bill, followed by the action of the Lords upon the parish councils and the employers' liabilities bills, has given the Liberal leaders ample cause for following out an avowed intention to have the "upper house" dissolved or modify its power. A letter printed in the Cynosure, some months ago, from an intelligent Englishman, set forth very clearly the tremendous difficulties that will confront the Liberals in their designs against the Lords. According to our correspondent, it will require almost a total revolution of the British government to insure success.

The progress of woman suffrage derives new interest from the recent woman-suffrage convention. An effort will be made in the forthcoming Constitutional convention in New York to provide that women's right to vote on all questions shall be submitted to the people. A contest distinguished for warmth is anticipated when the question comes up in the convention. At present, in some form, with modifications, woman suffrage exists in Arizona, Colorado, Delaware, Idaho, Illinois, Indiana, Kansas, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Minnesota, Montana, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, North Dakota, Oklahoma, Oregon, South Dakota, Texas, Vermont, Washington and Wisconsin. In the South the idea has not gained much of a foothold, from the fact that the people do not favor the doubling of the illiterate vote. The action of the New York convention will have a great effect upon the reform, whatever the result may be.

The dispute at Monmouth, Warren Co., Ill., over the men and methods by whom and which the corner-stone of the new courthouse should be laid, was settled on Thursday evening last. The stone was put in place, in the presence of only a few spectators, by the builders' masons, and not by the fraternal Masons. There was no ceremony. It will be remembered that there has been a great deal of acrimony engendered by the preparation for this event. The building committee turned the matter of laying the stone over to the Warren County Bar Association, and they invited the Masonic brotherhood to preside. This stirred the United Presbyterians, of whom there were several on the building committee, and a protracted discussion ensued. The Masons took no part in the affair, but allowed the building committee and the Bar Association to fight it out. The result was that the Bar Association finally withdrew from the program altogether, and the invitation to the Masons was rescinded. It was an Anti-masonic triumph.

A number of prominent gentlemen and ladies met in this city, last week, representing various shades of politics and vocations, and organized "The Civic Federation of Chicago." By-laws were adopted, and officers elected, with Lyman J. Gage as President. The work of the federation, as outlined in the constitution, is to be divided into the following general departments: Municipal, philanthropic, industrial, educational, social and moral. Other departments may be added by the central council provided for in the by-laws. The constitution says that the federation shall consist of a board of trustees composed of fifteen members, a central council of ninety-nine, and of such subordinate ward and precinct councils as may be from time to time organized under the authority of the central council. The intention is to purify the political atmosphere of the city, for which there is no doubt abundant need. Office-holders are to be barred out of the movement, and professedly, the adoption of all necessary reputable measures for cleansing the municipal administration will be adopted.

FIDELITY TO CHRIST.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

God is said to be faithful. "Faithful is he that calleth you, who also will do it." He is faithful that promised." "He is the faithful and true witness." "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins." His people are called to be faithful. Moses was faithful in his house. Hananiah was faithful and feared the Lord. "Be thou faithful unto death." "Who is that faithful and wise servant?" "Well done, good and faithful servant." Fidelity is the desire of the mind and purpose of the will to scrupulously perform all our duty. This describes a faithful servant, a faithful parent, a faithful magistrate, a faithful minister; in short, a faithful man. To be faithful, these conditions are essential:

1. That we know what is required of us. A physician cannot be faithful unless he understands diseases and their remedies. Hence it is required that he attend a medical-school and have a diploma before being allowed to practice. A lawyer must graduate from a law-school and pass a rigid examination before being admitted to the bar. This is to protect clients against impostors in the courts of justice. A man is not qualified to be a minister of the Gospel until he has mastered the great principles which underlie the profession. Hence it is required that he graduate in the college and theological seminary before being ordained. So it is necessary that we understand what Christ would have us to do before we can be faithful. "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" is the question of the awakened soul. To this question the response comes: "Search the Scriptures, for in them ye think ye have eternal life, and they are they which testify of me." And when Christ commissioned his ambassadors to preach the Gospel to every creature, he added: "Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have said unto you."

2. That we appreciate our obligation. A physician recognizes that the life of his patient is in his hand, and that awakens in him a sense of responsibility. A parent sees that the future happiness, prosperity and usefulness of his child depends upon the home-training that he receives, and this creates a desire and wish and effort to be faithful. A minister recognizes that he stands between the living and the dead, and that the salvation of the perishing depends upon the message that he carries, and that it is at the peril of his own soul that he withholds the truth. This serves as an irresistible impulse in making the true preacher faithful. So in order to be faithful to Christ, it is necessary that we have just views of the ground of our obligation to him. He has lifted from us the sentence of condemnation, by enduring it himself; he has purchased for us eternal life, bestowed upon us the title of sons of God and made us co-heirs with himself. "Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price."

3. The desire and purpose to serve Christ must be dominant. There may be a general wish and intention to do his will, but these may be overcome by opposing influences. A depraved heart within, the attractions of the world and the temptations of Satan without, may be stronger than the desire and purpose. Hence we are exhorted to be filled with the Spirit. "It is not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord." "Work out your own salvation with fear and trembling, for it is God that worketh in you both to will and to do of his good pleasure." "It is no more I that do it," says Paul, "but the grace of God which was with me." "Yet not I, but Christ within me." It is therefore apparent,—

1. That fidelity to Christ is a simple duty. Christ and the believer enter into a mutual and solemn covenant. The Redeemer engages to deliver him from guilt by his blood; to deliver him from the power and pollution of sin by his grace, and order his life so that all things shall work together for his good; and when his work is accomplished, to reward him with eternal glory. These promises are sure. Not one can fail. "I know in whom I have believed, and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him against that day." The believer engages to obey his Saviour-King in all things, as the angels do in heaven; that he will cheerfully do all and endure all his Master's will. As Christ is faithful in keeping his covenant promises to him, the believer desires and purposes to perform all his vows to his exalted Redeemer.

2. It is a most comprehensive duty. A faithful employe is one who is honest, industrious, and obedient, who gives his time and energies of mind and body according to contract. A faithful minister is one who studies God's Word diligently, that he may bring forth from its treasures things new and old; who preaches the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth; who rightly divides the truth and gives to each his portion in due season, and who performs his duty to the wicked, the ignorant, the sick, the suffering, the young, the old, the rich, the poor. He gives himself wholly to the work. He does not attempt to serve God and mammon, Christ and Belial, the church and the world. His eye is single, his life is undivided. A faithful elder watches for the souls of those over the which the Holy Ghost has made him overseer; he visits the sick, he counsels the erring, and strives to win souls to Christ. A faithful deacon is one who holds the church's funds as sacredly as his own goods; who quietly and unobtrusively secures from each member of the church the largest contribution, and so brings free-will offerings until the Lord's treasury is overflowing. A faithful church-member is one who hallows the Sabbath and reverences God's sanctuary; who does not neglect the assembling of God's people, as the manner of some is, whose secular work is sanctified by his doing it for Christ's sake, and who regards himself as the steward of God, dispensing his wordly goods according to the divine will.

3. It is a duty of permanent obligation. It is not a debt that may be paid and cancelled. It is not a piece of work that may be completed and dismissed. But it is an obligation that rests upon us through life. "If any man draw back, my soul shall have no pleasure in him." "Be thou faithful unto death." "If a righteous man turn away from his righteousness and committeth iniquity, for his iniquity that he hath done shall he die."

4. It is a most difficult duty. It implies superiority to our indolence, our passions, our love of pleasure, our fear of man, our desire of wealth and applause. It means that we resist the wiles of the devil, "whom resist, steadfast in the faith." It signifies that we make war upon the forces of evil. "For we wrestle not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against the spirits of wickedness in high places." It makes us workers together with God in building his spiritual temple, so that we are like the builders of the walls of Jerusalem under Nehemiah: "They wrought in the work with one hand, and with the other they held their weapons of warfare."

5. It is a duty performed for Christ's sake. To do this three things are essential: 1. There must be a recognition of the majesty and glory of Christ's person. "When it pleases the Father to reveal his Son in our hearts," and we see the beauty and excellency and glory of him who has all the perfections of God and man, our hearts go out to him.

"Whom have I in heaven high, but thee, O Lord, alone;
And in the earth whom I desire, besides thee there is none."

"My beloved is mine, and I am his." "For me to live is Christ." 2. A recognition of the unspeakable value and magnitude of what Christ has done for us. The English Parliament arranged to have one of their princes born in Wales, that this province might be bound more closely to the English throne. So the successor to Queen Victoria will be "the Prince of Wales." God's Son was born in this world, of a virgin mother, that his people might be drawn more closely to him. "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us." In 1777 a French prince, Lafayette, only 20 years old, fitted out a ship at his own expense and crossed the sea and offered his services to the American Congress. He asked to serve as a private, without pay. He served to the end of the Revolution and returned home. In 1824 he came back and spent a year, visiting the twenty-four States, and Congress voted him $200,000 and a township of land, in token of their gratitude. Christ came and conquered our enemies and took the spoil. In token of our gratitude, we say: "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse." "We love him because he first loved us." 3. An assurance that we are the objects of his love. Paul says: "Having the love of Christ shed abroad in your hearts by the Holy Spirit." This gives us an unshaken conviction that Christ loves us. This is the impulsive power of a new life.

PROPHETIC STUDIES—THE SECRET EMPIRE.

BY W. J. CONNERY.

[The following article comes to us with the commendation of Rev. M. A. Gault.—EDITOR CYNOSURE:]

The beast of the sea (Rev. 13) represents the Roman Empire, after it was divided into ten kingdoms. The ten kingdoms are represented by the ten horns upon the one beast.

This beast has also seven heads. The head of the human body is the highest part—the seat of intellect, etc. The head of a stream, or river, is its source. Both meanings may be attached to the heads of this beast. The heads were Babylon, Media, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Ancient Rome, and Rome after it was divided into ten kingdoms. Upon each of these heads were "names of blasphemy."

Each of these heads had their secret orders, with their mysterious and blasphemous rites, ceremonies, oaths, etc., sanctioned and upheld, if not instituted, by the civil power. The beast of the earth, in the same chapter, is the papacy. These two beasts are very closely connected together. The second "exerciseth all the power of the first in his sight." "And he causeth the earth (the civil organization), and them which dwell therein (the members of it), to worship the first beast, whose deadly wound was healed." He also gave orders to the members of the civil organization, "that they should make an image to the beast which had the wound by a sword and did live." Good and sufficient reasons have been given for understanding this image of the beast as representing the secret empire—Jesuitism, Freemasonry, etc.

In chapter 17, these same beastly systems are represented, in the last stage of their existence—when they were "about to go into perdition," as still more closely connected. The papacy is represented as a woman sitting upon the first beast; the beast sustaining and carrying her, and she guiding and controlling the beast. This beast is here described as "a scarlet-colored beast," indicating his cruel and blood-thirsty disposition, and full of names of blasphemy. In the first stage of his existence he had these names of blasphemy upon his heads. Now they have spread until they have covered the whole system. The whole beast—inside and outside—is "full of names of blasphemy."

Is not this a true picture of all the anti-Christian civil governments of the world to-day?

The "woman"—the papacy—is equally guilty in this respect. Her name is "Mystery, Babylon the Great." How appropriate the name, when we consider that she has inherited, and still retains, and has added very largely to all the ancient Babylonian mysteries! She is also the "mother of the harlots, and of the abominations of the earth," "and she holds in her hand a cup full of abominations and filthiness of her fornication," whereby she has enticed all the nations and kings of the earth to commit spiritual fornication with her.

Let us be glad, and rejoice that he who is the "Prince of the kings of the earth" has given us the assurance in his Word that all these monstrous combinations of wickedness shall soon be "consumed with the spirit of his mouth, and destroyed with the brightness of his coming." 2 Thess. 2: 3.

EVIDENCE FOR FORMING A JUDGMENT AS TO SECRET SOCIETIES.

[Josiah W. Leeds, our esteemed friend and correspondent in Rocouncey, Penn., has the usual experience of anti-secrecy reformers in meeting with lodge resistance. One member of the secret empire recently called Bro. Leeds' attention to the fact that there are "a great many men of worth in the secret lodges." Bro. Leeds agrees with him, and then says:]

It is objected that as I probably am not nor have been a member of any secret order, I have not been so circumstanced as to express a trustworthy opinion upon the subject. Nevertheless I have found it quite necessary in the course of a not unobservant life to accept, in relation to a great many subjects, the evidence of reliable witnesses concerning the character and trend of such matters, without feeling under any obligation to tread the same path as the experience gatherers. The prayer that we be not led into temptation has a design to keep us out of presumption and sin in going in the way of unrequired personal experience. If we would accept the satisfied counsel of a good many "moderate drinkers" a glass of wine or mug of beer now and then would not do us a bit of harm; yet, while acknowledging a decided liking for the taste of the liquor, I find right here an injunction of higher obligation which warns me not to make such a use of my liberty concerning meat and drink as may either cause a weak brother to "offend," or may draw myself into a morally seductive and physically dangerous habit.

So, also, in the matter of cigar and cigarette smoking. A great many people will testify that they enjoy their "smoke" after meals and at other times; yet from the very large mass of evidence that has been presented to me, I am abundantly persuaded that my moral and physical being would be endangered by the habit, while my personal practice would help to fasten it upon others to their hurt. The agonized cry of the cigarette-poisoned young man who died awhile ago in Camden, "Tell all my friends that 'Duke's Best' have killed me, and beg of them never to smoke another," is the poignant testimony of a creditable witness. I have no call to go into that lodge, while additionally, I feel the duty laid upon me to say to the cigarette-cursed lads of this generation, "Don't go in!" and to the fathers, whose enjoyment of the weed has in so very many instances been a stumbling-block to their sons, "Keep away from it!" It will not be denied that the practice of smoking is almost universal on the part of the attenders at clubs and lodges. An example which comes to my mind, in confirmation, was a suit at law in the Common Pleas Court at Philadelphia, the plaintiff being a woman who had done cleaning in a building rented out for lodge-room purposes, and, whose plea for extra compensation, was that the labor she had had to perform in the way of removing tobacco dirt, stains, etc., was not reckoned in the contract under which she was hired.

Then, again, in the matter of the theatre, I have read the testimony of those who, having been attenders thereat, upon experiencing a change at heart have had to haste away from the practice as for their lives. Some of these were themselves playwrights or actors. John B. Gough was one; Judson was another. What loss would have been to the world had they rested satisfied in that "lodge" into which they had only entered, as it were, the first degree; while Sheridan Knowles, Montague Stanley, even Kemble and Dumas, veterans in the profession, have all raised the red flag of danger. Further, I have seen the current illustrated periodicals of the stage, which it were an offence to hand to any self-respecting person, man or woman. I have many times looked into the faces of the throngs of people, men, women and children, as they poured from a variety theatre building not far from my office in Philadelphia, their actions, their countenances and their speech, all telling me that they had been where the Lord of the meek, the merciful and the pure in heart would not have trodden, except it were in the way of entreaty or of judgment. On the other hand I have scanned the programs of the theatrical and operatic spectacles announced to be given at the first places of entertainment in the city, and I have noted that performances were presented the plots of which and the rendition of which had gained for them a notoriety for nastiness the world over. No, no, I shall not enter into that lodge; and I say, moreover, to those who have gone within, or who may be tempted to pass within the perilous portals, "Come away for your lives!"

Now, without having personally felt the desire or the necessity laid upon me to apply for admission to any of the secret orders, I claim to have perceived that affiliation with such organizations is not a true help to the individual so joining, while it may also become a source of weakness to the church. When the men go down to the lodge-room, while the women are left to seek the place of prayer; when lodge dues must be kept up, and the benevolent work of the church towards its own members or strangers is left to languish; when mothers spend the long evenings at home with the children and the family sewing, and fathers return from the lodge when the house is at rest and the lights are burning low; and when these same fathers, or brothers, or sons, as the case may be, have gone visiting the Grand Lodge in a distant city, accepting en masse the hospitality of theatre attendance and banquet, with, most likely, cigars and liquors to be additionally paid for, there must thence ensue a manifest loss of money and time, and moral and spiritual strength.

Likewise, in undertaking to arrive at the intrinsic value of the oath-bound secret orders, I must estimate the worth of the paraphernalia and the high sounding titles, which I find opposed to the simplicity of dress and address, which the Good Book enjoins. I could not bow the knee to any fellow-being and call him "Worshipful Master," nor should I encourage my neighbor to make use of the language of duty and adoration such as might fittingly be addressed to Omnipotence.

Excellent may be the purposes, in large part at least, of many of the orders, and while no exception can be taken, for instance, to the "Friendship, Love and Truth" of the Odd-fellows, yet I find the whole duty of man still more plainly and comprehensively pointed out in the divinely imparted obligation that we love the Lord, our God, with all our heart, soul, mind and strength, and our neighbor as ourselves. While I am persuaded that this country is receiving a foreign increment of population more rapidly than it can rightly assimilate it, and while some of the objects of the several "America for Americans" orders are not to be excepted to, yet I should not indorse the obligation in no case to employ any Roman Catholic, notwithstanding that the aims of the Jesuits to occupy place and secure power in this country are patent to all. The love to our neighbor, required of us, I believe, does not sustain us in employing such exclusive or retaliatory methods. The National League for the Protection of American Institutions is not secret. Its objects are openly declared, and it makes use of no grips, passwords or binding oaths.

Greatly to be extolled is the attribute of benevolence. This feature figures largely as the foundation principle of many of the secret orders. But I find from the United States statistics of some years ago, that a certain order which received the large annual sum of five million dollars, gave two millions of it to the poor and sick, and laid out over three millions on its regular expenses. From the report of the Grand Secretary of the Independent Order of Odd-fellows of Indiana, showing a membership of 39,706, it is shown that there was paid out for relief and charity during the term ending 12th-mo. 31, 1892, $68,745.17, and that the total expenses for the term were $148,636.87, by which it appears that the cost of distribution was what might fairly be called excessive. The religious meeting or church committees for the care of the poor and suffering serve, so far as I am aware, without charge. But the annual communication of the Grand Lodge, held at Indianapolis last spring, decided as to certain members delinquent in dues, "not entitled to benefits," "not entitled to funeral benefits."

The contender for secret societies to whom I have been partly making reply, incidentally refers to a Methodist in good standing as being a member. Now, I may say from personal knowledge that the editor of that Methodist periodical of excellent repute, the Guide of Holiness has stated that in the early days of his ministry he was foolish enough to be drawn into a lodge, that the initial experience satisfied him, and he had never been there since. My cousin, an editor of the Methodist Christian Standard of Philadelphia, told me that he had gone through three degrees and there stopped "for good," as multitudes have done. The trustee of a Methodist church frankly said to me that he had belonged to as many as nine secret organizations, and had been one of the original promoters of the extensive order of Knights of Pythias, but if he had his life to live over again he "would not join any of them," and he so always counsels his son. I omit his reasons in detail, not to unduly extend this communication. No higher name is in Methodist annals of the present century than that of Chas. G. Finney, who was instrumental in bringing so many sin-sick wanderers from darkness to light. Because of asserted advantages to accrue, he had in his early manhood joined a secret order, but no assured peace of mind could he find till he got away from the entanglement. Was it "perjury" thereafter, when he found it laid upon him to warn his brethren and the Christian world not to go into the forbidden paths, relating the perils he had met with; or was it not rather fealty to his Almighty Deliverer, the grateful act of one "clad and in his right mind?"

I need only say, in concluding, that while heart trouble may be, as suggested, the cause of some of the deaths we learn of in lodge initiation or precedure, other fatalities or serious disorders are differently referable. Such was the case with that Harvard student, who while being initiated, having been told that at the end of his journey he must jump off a precipice, became presently unconscious, and was so seriously affected mentally that he had to leave college, and for years was afflicted with trouble of the brain. Relative to the point that secrecy is observed in business, and also (as others say) in families and in some church affairs, I reply, that a great part of this is privacy only. There is a distinction between the two things. For instance, the same mail which brought me the published letter of my objector, brought also a denominational paper in which was published a statement of matters considered by the last gathering of the meeting for sufferings of Friends, held in Philadelphia. The proceedings of this meeting are to an extent private, yet if any member feels it to be proper, and that it may be helpful to others to say what was done, he may do so. One thing mentioned as being considered and done was the pitiful condition of many of the people on the sea-coast and islands of South Carolina, a committee being set apart to consider the subject, and to take such steps towards the relief of the South Carolina sufferers as the way should rightly open for. Since then two members of that committee have gone down to the coast. Now, in providing for or administering (without charges) the relief that has been or may be contributed, I feel sure that those Friends will neither ask the recipients whether they do or do not belong to any secret order, nor will they be curious as to the particular religious denominations with which they have fellowship, nor will they (most probably) find occasion to give aid to a single person of their own denomination. "Love as brethren; be pitiful, be courteous."—Westchester (Pa.) Local News.

WHY I LEFT THE MASONIC LODGE.

I have several reasons. I preferred to follow Christ.

I wanted a clean heart, and knew I must have a complete consecration of everything before I could hope to get it. My means and everything must be God's. So I had to give up the lodge.

After I had given myself to him I could not go where he was not allowed to go, for there is no Christ in the lodge.

Then to be in the lodge was to be unequally yoked together with unbelievers. I have been called all sorts of names for saying there were infidels in the lodge; but we know there are.

To be in the lodge was to be conformed to the world.

And last, but not least, I believed in an old-fashioned religion that takes all love of the world out of the soul. I might write more upon the subject but I forbear. I hope these few lines may help a little on this important question of moral reform.

This is the tenth anniversary of my conversion. I am happy in the Lord to-day, saved clear out from the world and all its dissipating amusements, pride, pomp and show. I have crucified the flesh, conquered the devil and got the world under my feet. Christ is in my heart. Heaven in my view, and glory in my soul. Did it not pay to leave the lodge?—Frank Hitz, in the St. Louis Vanguard.

UNCHRISTIAN CHARACTER OF THE A. P. A.

It has been a most singular movement. It was heralded by documents so full of misrepresentations and stupid falsehoods that they make a student of church history to gasp and stare. It has been supported by newspapers that should cause a hissing and an amazement wherever there are public schools. I have read in them articles containing more of the essence of deviltry than I ever saw openly expressed before. The society itself has in its aims and methods the most glaring contradictions. Started in the name of Protestantism, it violates its fundamental principle of toleration. Believing in the separation of church and state, it proposes one of the most odious features of an establishment of religion in excluding men from office because of their manner of worshiping God. Shouting for freedom, it seeks to establish a tyranny of the majority, giving the minority no representation. In the name of freedom it stabs freedom to the heart; in the name of Christianity it cultivates an un-Christian spirit; in short, it uses the weapons of the devil in the professed cause of Christ.

That I submit is a tremendous indictment, and every clause in it can be substantiated. It shows how thoughtlessly men will do things, and especially the great danger that lurks in an absence of anything like public discussion, that so many good men have been led into it. Men, good and kind and loyal, men with mothers and wives and children, have taken an oath that Beelzebub might have written and chuckled over. The very elect have been deceived. Strangest of all, there are ministers, "blind leaders of the blind,"—may God have mercy upon their darkened understandings! who champion it—preachers of the Gospel of love and subscribers to an oath that contains the essence of the spirit of hatred. It is most marvelous and astounding. . . . . Error can be destroyed only by the power of truth; darkness can be driven away only by light; evil can be overcome only by good; hatred can be conquered only by love. This is the secret of Christ, and in this alone is the power of Christianity to move, to persuade, and to win.—From a sermon by Rev. Alex. Milne, at Columbus, O., Nov. 26, 1894.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A New England blizzard.—A gruesome relic.—A pyschological theory.—Taxing church property—The subway plan.—The tobacco fiend.—Hidden treasure.

The blizzard under which the West has been snowed up has just struck New England; and happy is the man or woman who can sit by the fireside "enclosed in a tumultuous privacy of storm," with the happy sense of no obligation resting on him or her to breast its fury. What a felicitous expression, by the way, is that of Emerson's which I have just quoted! How, in two words, it seems to place before us the essence of comfort:—the ruddy fireside, the books, the work, the quiet; and, without, the drifting snow, the rushing, howling blast as it sweeps down from its birth-place in that vast waste of rock-ribbed, ice-bound desert land, big enough for two United States, which stretches behind us in savage and awful desolation to the North Pole. But spring is on her way, and these howling winds and drifting snows are but the stern ushers that herald the first violet and blue-bird. If "life is but a winter's day," as the old hymn has it—I am not at all prepared to subscribe to the sentiment, but as I said, if it is, who would not bear cheerfully the storms and gales, remembering that but a little way on is everlasting spring-tide?

At Bethel, Vermont, Mrs. Ruth Rowell, a descendant of the famous Hannah Dustin, has just celebrated her 92d birthday. This has brought out an interesting item of history. There was a web of linen on the loom in the Dustin household at the time the Indians attacked Haverhill, about two hundred years ago. This web of linen was a welcome piece of spoils to the red-skinned foe, who carried it off with their captives on the long and terrible journey through the wilds of northern New England towards Canada. The story is a familiar one:—how Mrs. Dustin, with a courage born of desperation, and doubtless with the image of her cruelly-slaughtered seven-days-old babe before her eyes, planned the escape of the little party, and nerved them to kill their captors while sleeping in their night encampment on what is now Dustin Island, in the Contoocook river. This New England Judith wrapped the scalps taken from the slain enemy in a piece torn from this very web of linen, which rather gruesome heirloom has been handed down through the generations to the oldest daughter, till now it is in the possession of Mrs. Rowell. Apropos to these reminiscences, a new female evangelist has appeared in the country towns of eastern Connecticut and western Rhode Island, felicitously named Miss Deborah Knox, and a lineal descendent of old John Knox, whose prayers were feared more than an army by the Stuart queen. As a rule, I abhor puns, and am not often guilty of perpetrating them, but the temptation to hope that this lady evangelist will prove worthy of her name, and deal those strongholds of Satan's kingdom—the saloon and the lodge—some hard "knocks," is too great to be resisted.

A singular story of spiritual manifestations, of tables that dance about the room, and household utensils that won't stay on the shelves, comes from an isolated New Hampshire town, the scene being a lonely farmhouse, and the phenomena seeming to center about a young girl in the family who complains of being constantly pinched by some unknown and invisible hand. Had all this happened in the days of the witchcraft delusion, how many poor old women would have fallen under suspicion, and perhaps paid the penalty of their supposed crime by the noose about their necks. Thank God that the world as it grows wiser has grown also more merciful. It has occurred to me, in this connection, that while we occasionally hear of a haunted house in New England, it is usually an empty one, and stands by the roadside in some remote country place—it would not be possible to find one with a haunted room like the one described in a recent English story, where the hero imprisoned in it for his sympathy with the Puritan cause finds "the rotten old curtains and the very bed-clothes" are still there, and as he shivering draws back "the mouldy coverlet and blankets," sees "the dark stain on the bed beneath," the memorial of a long-past tragedy. A Yankee housekeeper would have had that coverlet and blanket out on the line, ghost or no ghost, in the twinkling of an eye. She would have subjected "the dark stain" to a rigid and searching examination, pronounced it mildew, and sent Johnny to the nearest drug-store for some muriatic acid to take it out. The darker, the dustier, the more crowded with rubbish any corner of her domain, the more does she burn to invade it when the fever of spring cleaning is fairly on her. This solves the whole mystery, for what self-respecting ghost could ever submit to the ignominy or live through the terrors of a regular "spring clean"? I am inclined to think that as a means of exorcism, the broom and the scrubbing-brush decidedly beat the "bell, book, and candle" of the Middle Ages.

There has been a hearing at the State House on the burning question of taxing church property. There was but one remonstrant present, of course an Irish Romanist, who spoke in behalf of his church in a speech both inconsequent and illogical. Referring to St. James, on Harrison Avenue, valued at between three or four hundred thousand dollars, he said that to tax it at the regular rate, twelve or thirteen dollars on a thousand would be too heavy a burden for the church to bear, as the members could hardly carry the burdens now imposed. He did not explain, however, why the holy Mother Church should thus cruelly tax her own children till they stagger under the weight. To many of our Protestant churches taxation would be a blessing in disguise, hindering them from expending so much money on costly edifices, which might be better spent in helping to evangelize the heathen of our own and foreign lands.

Subway plans for the relief of congested Boston have at last been submitted by the commissioners. It is to connect with an elevated system of electric roads for the outlying suburban towns. If these plans are accepted, there need be no longer any fear that the sacreligious hand of business will be laid on our old historic Common.

There has been trouble again in the Charlestown State Prison, the tobacco fiend being at the bottom. The men use the tobacco given them as money, storing it up and sending it, when opportunity offers, outside the prison to be sold. A knowledge of this coming to the warden, it was decided by the prison authorities not to give out any last Saturday, which caused the incipient riot. Why tobacco should be considered such a necessity in our penal institutions that it must be supplied by the State doth not appear. Certainly the prisoners would be better off, physically and morally, without it. The other day a salesman dropped dead in a hotel on Columbus Avenue, from paralysis of the heart, brought on by excessive smoking of the deadly cigarette. "If you do not give up the practice you will die before you are twenty-one," had been the dictum of his physician. "I am now thirty-three and was never in better health in my life," was his reply made, just before his sudden death, to a friendly remonstrance. Tobacco is like all other narcotics—eminently deceitful; but I suppose this little item in our daily papers will make little or no impression on the great army of smokers who use this familiar argument to prove that "smoking don't hurt them any."

I never heard of any one who made a business of searching for hidden treasures ever coming across any; it is always by accident that one stumbles over such things. This was recently proved when some workmen engaged in repairs on an old building in Waltham, Mass., came across a bag of Spanish doubloons, along with antique watches, pearls, rings and other jewelry, contained in a leather box of peculiar shape, hid away between the partitions of the chimney. That old box might tell a story equal to one of Hawthorne's most weird romances if it could speak.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 14, 1894.

The first week of the Moody and Sankey meetings closed last night. Nothing has ever been seen in Washington like the attendance at these meetings. There has been only one meeting at which every seat in the mammoth Convention Hall was not filled, and overflow meetings held in near-by churches, and then it was a blinding storm of sleet and snow that slightly cut into the attendance. But even on that night it was estimated that nearly 4,000 people were there. I have only heard one criticism of the meetings, and that was, that so many regular church-goers attended that the non-church-going people were shut out in large numbers at every meeting, the church-goers having patience enough to go early and wait for the doors to open.

Whence comes the wonderful power of these two men over their fellows? Why do everyday truths when stated by Mr. Moody seem more convincing than ever before, and why do familiar words when sung by Mr. Sankey go more directly to the heart than when sung by others? That this power is God-given cannot be doubted by the person who has attended even one of their meetings. To see a person who has an hour before declared himself opposed to excitement at religious meetings quivering with excitement brought on by hearing these men talk and sing, and witnessing its electrical effect upon a vast mass of people, is enough to convince the most skeptical. They conquer the intending mockers as if by magic. On two nights Mr. Moody made the words of St. Paul in his epistle to the Galatians—"Be not deceived; God is not mocked. For whatsoever a man shall sow that also shall he reap"—his text, and he brought the full meaning home to his hearers by scores of homely illustrations. For instance, he said: "You cannot sow whisky without reaping drunkards. A man cannot sell whisky without reaping drunkenness. If I sold a drink of whisky to a man, that man would sell a drink of the same to my son or one of my kinsman, and I would surely reap what I had sown. No man who sells whisky is pure and happy. He has a skeleton in the closet somewhere. He has some relative who is a drunkard. I do not say this to denounce the saloon-keepers. I simply want to remonstrate with them and plead with them to quit the business. Don't sell out. Don't sell the stuff. Knock out the bung and let it waste....Don't let any man talk to me about his Christianity while he has connection with this traffic. No man has ever been in the business but who has been cursed for it in various ways. No man should rent his property, at no matter for how high a figure, for a saloon. The man who does this will reap just as surely as the man who sells the whisky. I am talking facts, not poetry. I once knew a man who rented property to a rum-seller, because the temptation of the rent was too much for him to withstand, and all the sons of the renter, four of them, died drunkards. Let us see what kind of seed we are sowing."

One of the notable features of these meetings is the large number of men prominent in public life who attend them, occupying seats upon the platform from which Mr. Moody speaks. In one group at one of the meetings were the following well-known men: Justices Strong and Hagner; Admiral Jouett, of the navy; Senators Frye, George, Squire, Proctor, and Peffer, the first and last-named taking part in the meeting to the extent of delivering fervent prayers. The ministers and church-workers are, of course, on hand at all the meetings to assist in the good work.

Three happy surprises were sprung upon the large congregation of Foundry M. E. church, last Sunday, by Dr. Brown, the pastor. First, he announced that one of the members, Mr. William J. Sibley, had given $10,000 to the Woman's Home Missionary Society, to build a hospital, in connection with the Lucy Webb Hayes Home, as a memorial to his wife, to be known as the Dorothea Lowndes Sibley Memorial Hospital. The second surprise was the announcement that Mr. Israel W. Sibley, a brother of the first donator, had paid off a mortgage of $10,000 on the church, which had been a source of worry for nearly twenty years. The next and last surprise was a proposition that the congregation then and there raise $900, necessary to pay off the floating indebtedness of the church and provide some small necessities. It was quickly done, and the historic church stands clear of debt.

The Senate has spent the greater part of this week listening to speeches on the Hawaiian question, of which Senators seem desirous of disposing before the tariff discussion opens. *

REFORM NEWS.

THE PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION—"LAST CALL."

457 NORTH SIXTH STREET,
PHILADELPHIA, Feb. 15, 1894.

"LAST CALL FOR DINNER!"

So said the porter on the train. This is the last call through the Cynosure for friends to gather at the State Convention, soon to be held in this city. For some weeks past the Cynosure has been telling its readers of the good things in store for this gathering. The program speaks for itself. A feast is prepared for those seeking knowledge regarding "the things done of them in secret." I believe that God is mightily moving on the hearts of the people. Letters of commendation and inquiry are received daily.

It is expected to send this issue of the Cynosure to all the Protestant ministers of Philadelphia. Please give notice of this gathering to your people on Sabbath, and invite them to meet with us. Should you not favor opposition to secret societies, we will be glad to hear from you at the open parliament. Ministers should be of but one mind regarding those things that are fundamental to Christianity. So we open the door and say: "Come, let us reason together." The work of our Association is not limited to any church denomination. We are glad to help any and all churches in the securing and maintaining a right testimony regarding the secret lodge system.

It will be noticed by our program that about twenty-five persons, representing nearly that number of denominations, expect to participate in the discussions. The testimonies of brethren Rev. Stephen Merritt, of New York, and Ezra F. McIntire, of Boston, will be especially appreciated, when it is known that they have both taken a large number of Masonic degrees, the former having occupied the position of Worshipful Master of the largest Masonic lodge in New York City. Their testimony may be expected on the afternoon of Feb. 26.

My past week has been crowded with labor. So many letters to answer; so many notices to send out; so many editors to be seen; so many pastors to be visited; so many doors open for lecturers. What shall I do first? is the question.

Saturday (or, as Friends say, seventh day) evening, I was privileged to visit many of the Friends (Quakers), who responded to Edwin and Virginia Sellew's invitation to spend the evening at their home, it being the occasion of their silver wedding. Several expressed a wish to attend the convention.

Sabbath morning I worshiped with those meeting at Bethel Mission, Rev. L. Frank Haas, pastor. I spoke again, last evening, for Bro. Haas. He is holding meetings every evening, advertising the convention, and will help what he can. Sabbath evening found me with our Swedish Congregational friends. I am always sure of a welcome there. The hall was well-filled. Those present were largely young people. They were glad to know of the purposed convention. After I had talked for half an hour, the pastor, Rev. Mr. Enquist, spoke to them in their mother-tongue.

On Monday evening I responded to an invitation extended by Rev. T. T. Myers, pastor of the church of the Brethren, to address his people. This attendance was not large, as the night was very stormy. Those present, however, manifested much interest. I am to continue the discussion next Monday evening. Questions were asked. One young man, who said he belonged to the I. O. O. F. and two other of the minor lodges, claimed that Christ was recognized in all. When I read the decision of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, showing it was unlawful to use the name of Christ in Odd-fellows' lodge-worship, he had nothing further to say.

Next Sabbath I am to preach in the morning for Bro. Edgar, in the church where the convention is to be held; and Sabbath evening in the Twelfth Street Baptist church, Bro. L. G. Jordan, pastor.

I must hasten now to fill my evening appointment in the Germantown German Baptist church. This church is historical, being the oldest of that denomination in this country.

In my next report I hope to give an account of what is to be in many ways the grandest convention held in this State. We are just as certain of victory as the sun is to rise; for God is on our side, and those who are on his side are always victorious. I don't know whether there are to be as many people as attended the convention in Carnegie Music Hall, Allegheny, at this gathering. It looks as though the gathering of the people was to be large. But I know that the Divine Spirit will be there. I know that men and women, enthused with a zeal born of God, will (humanly speaking) be there, and that those who do come will be blessed and made a blessing to others. So come along, and let us unite our efforts "for God and home and native land."

W. B. STODDARD.

FROM THE COLLEGE AGENT.

OGDEN, Utah, Feb. 14, 1894.

PACIFIC GROVE.

This is thought to be the finest resort, or outing, for tourists on the continent. The great Pacific current flows up the coast from the equatorial regions, thoroughly prepared to moderate the storms and frosts of winter and to change the burning heat of summer to the "soft and balmy air" so delightful to weary mortals. The location of Pacific Grove gives it the full benefit of this atmospheric arrangement. It has the bay of Monterey on the one side, and the ocean, two or three miles away, on the other. It is near Monterey, the old capital, which Gen. Fremont took when he crossed the continent in the time of the war with Mexico. This place has grown up since then, and it has cottages and tents by the score and hundred. These are empty in winter, but they are crowded with the throngs of strangers during other seasons of the year.

The main business of the permanent residents is to care for the multitudes who are taking their outing. There is a fine school-house, a Methodist church, and a Congregational church called the Mayflower, the Rev. E. S. Williams, pastor.

After a long vacation here I went on to San Jose to the Pacific University. I was cordially received by the president, and soon had arrangements made to place our anti-secrecy books in their library, free for the use of all the students.

I then took the train for San Francisco, which I made headquarters for some time. At Berkeley, not far from Oakland, I found the University of California, which is a State institution. It is very large, and has a number of departments besides the literary and scientific course. There is one for the study of law; one for medicine; one of pharmacy, and one for military drill, in charge of an officer of the United States Army. And they were drilling (perhaps a hundred or more) on the campus when I went in. The most notable annex is the Lick Observatory, with its mighty telescope. But it is located at some distance on Mt. Hamilton, a high and separate point, especially suitable for astronomical work. The librarian readily consented to receive our reform books, and said they gave all parties an equal chance there.

The Pacific Theological Seminary is at Oakland, just across the bay from San Francisco. An effort was made, at first, to establish an interdenominational divinity school, and when this failed, the Congregationalists felt impelled to proceed with the work alone, which they have done since A. D. 1869. I found the Cynosure on file in the reading-room, and Prof. Geo. Mooar, D. D., readily consented to place the publications of the National Christian Association in the seminary library.

One of the best endowed and richest colleges of our country is Stanford University, located at Palo Alto. There are many costly buildings, fine halls, large dormitories, an immense museum and library, and, I think, about one thousand students. The late Senator Stanford, upon the death of his only son, determined to use his immense fortune in founding and endowing an institution of learning as a memorial of his son, and to be called by his name, Leland Stanford, Jr. I had a pleasant interview with President Jordan, and obtained directions for sending our reform literature to the university.

May the dear Lord bless the little seeds thus sown, and cause them to grow up and bring forth a harvest of a thousand-fold. As ever yours,

S. F. PORTER.

CORRESPONDENCE.

ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION IN WISCONSIN.

POYNETTE, Wis., Feb. 15, 1894.

To the Friends of Anti secrecy in Wisconsin:

What about a State meeting this year? Can some one devote time to working up a convention? Can any one name a suitable place? All places are needy, and why may we not have another such meeting as we had here last winter?

Please write to me, or to W. I. Phillips, about the matter. J. B. GALLOWAY, Pres.

REV. P. B. WILLIAMS AS A LECTURER.

WOODBURN, Ore., Feb. 8, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It was my pleasure to be at Philomath, Ore., on Monday evening, February 5, 1894, when Rev. P. B. Williams, secretary of the Oregon branch of the National Christian Association, delivered one of the best anti-secret lectures to which I have ever listened. It was a plain, logical statement of the whole system.

The arguments were very clear and concise. He showed that the so-called charities of the orders were anything but charity.

In a most convincing manner, he clearly demonstrated the truth that the F. and A. M., I. O. O. F., and A. O. U. W. had their systems of benevolence and charity on a plane far above that of suffering humanity; or, in other words, humanity that can afford to pay initiation fees, and keep up monthly dues, is not in need of charity.

Many of the lodge-men were there, and manifested considerable interest. The lecturer was manly and Christian in all his bearings. I am sure the work of reform will prosper in his hands. May God bless him abundantly, and cause his face to shine upon him. Yours in Christian fellowship, HENRY L. BARKLEY.

A DELAYED LETTER—EXPERIENCES OF AN ANTI-SECRETIST.

[The following letter, from an esteemed co-worker, was received some time ago, and contains much of interest, although its publication has been delayed. But it has lost none of its excellence. It comes to us from Holyoke, Colo. —EDITOR CYNOSURE.]

(Concluded.)

Recently, in conversation with a seceded Odd-fellow, he said that everything in the lodge was taken from the Bible. I shook my head, and told him that he ought not to say so (for he claims to be religious). "Oh," he replied, "it is all founded on and taken from the Bible." I asked him where, in the Bible, a man was placed under any obligation to be blindfolded to become a Christian. "Well," he said, "that is not there, but all the balance is, and that is necessary in becoming a member." I said: "Where, in the Bible, is a man compelled to walk over chains or rough places to become a Christian?" His reply was: "That is not there either; but it is to teach humility, etc."—giving the exact words of the published ritual, but which I am unable to quote. "Well," I said, "I reckon the open coffin containing the skeleton, before which the hoodwink is taken from the man's eyes, teaches humility also." "Yes," said he, "these are all to make an impression on the mind of the candidate; but I meant the purity of the—friendship, love and charity." I referred him to the Good Samaritan and asked if there was any sworn obligation in that case; then I proceeded to show the folly of exercising charity among a select few, where there is no real principle of charity, since it costs $2.00 to give away $1 00.

In our recent chat I was defied to prove that secret societies had anything to do with politics. Why should I ask for positive proof that a certain object exists, when it is so near that I can see it for myself? It needs no proof. "Neither," I said, "does your proposition need proof; for it is a self-evident fact that while the lodges contain only a small percentage of the voters in the country, and there are six principal offices to be filled, and fifteen candidates, I notice that eleven or twelve of them belong to the lodges. Thus I am reminded of a hen with a brood of chickens in a farmyard. When a little fellow has caught a bug and chirps, or the old hen clucks, they all run to seize the spoil; but if one has secured it, there is no contention; the rest scatter and hunt for more. So it is in lodge politics; the lodges are all in the county seat here; they all flock to each other's aid. Then, when their men are elected, they never tell how it was done."

To those of equal and far superior starry brilliancy in this dark night of our nation, allow me to say: Let us not be overcome by the little clouds or mists that may gather around us; but let that little light which is given to us shine in its purity. Let us not be like a once good —— minister here (who has been strictly opposed to secret societies), who canvassed the county this fall for a full-fledged lodgeman's ticket, and, when it was elected, received as his reward $10 and a pair of trousers. We should be careful not to get too far beyond our privileges, subjecting ourselves to those of whom Paul says: "God shall send them strong delusion, that they should believe a lie: that they all might be damned."—2 Thess. 2: 11, 12.

I am yours, twinkling away in my weakness until the sun rises, or Jesus comes.

J. T. CULLOR.

FROM REV. H. H. HINMAN.

FARNAM, Neb., Feb. 9, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—Southwestern Nebraska is still largely the home of the prairie-dog and the coyotes, but the enterprising settler is pressing hard on their domain. Numerous sod-houses are dotting the illimitable prairie, and occasionally a pretty farm-dwelling shows where more abundant means have secured a nicer home. Almost every house has its bored well, from 100 to 400 feet deep, yielding abundance of water, which is raised by wind-pumps. The country is, in many places, seamed and furrowed by deep gulches or canyons, which often make it necessary for travelers to make large detours. The country here is elevated, the air is dry, and the rainfall small and uncertain. Nevertheless, during the seven years since settlers came here, they have had fairly good crops, and this year are selling largely to the people of the Platte Valley, on the north.

The little village of Farnam, in the southwest corner of Dawson county, has about 300 inhabitants, four or five stores, a bank, one Congregational church, and no saloon. The A. O. U. W. have an active lodge, and the A. F. and A. M. are sparsely represented. The people are intelligent and enterprising, and, amidst many obstacles and with hard times, are having a reasonable prosperity.

Young groves have been started in many places; sod-school-houses afford comfortable places for education and religious worship. Great piles of corn-cobs furnish most of the fuel.

The settlers here are largely young people just beginning in life, and I was glad to find that so generally they are Christians and at much inconvenience maintain religious worship. There is the usual kindly interest in all new-comers, such as is always seen in all new countries.

It is doubtful if this part of the State can ever have as large a population as the eastern portion; but as the buffalo grass affords winter pasturage, wherever the ground is not covered with snow, there will always be an opportunity to raise cattle, horses and sheep, while tree-planting will bring more rain. This is just west of the 100th meridian, beyond which it has been supposed that farming was not profitable. But lands here are increasing in value and are much higher than I had supposed.

There is a great work to be done in planting religious and educational institutions in this vast and growing country. I am expecting to hold some meetings in the Congregational church at Farnam, which has been kindly offered for our use, and to remain about ten days longer, when I expect to go to Kansas.

We have had a remarkably fine and beautiful winter, but just now we are granted a Nebraska blizzard. The kindness and hospitality of the people is unbounded, and though living in a sod-house, I am lacking in no good thing.

The New Volume of Pen and Pencil Series.

WELSH PICTURES Drawn with Pen and Pencil.

By D. Lewis Jones, Morris Jones, Edward Ffoulkes, H. Elvet Lewis, D. Tyssil Evans, D. Davies and O. M. Edwards. Edited by Richard Lovett, M. A. With many Illustrations. Imperial 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, boxed..... 3.20

"'Welsh pictures' is the work of ten Welshmen, among whom illustrating the beauties of Wales has been parcelled out according to the special familiarity of each. The result is a pleasing volume."—London Times.

THE EARTHLY FOOTPRINTS OF OUR RISEN LORD, Illumined.

A continuous narrative of the Four Gospels according to The Revised Version, with introduction by Rev. John Hall, D. D. Illustrated by 113 full-page half tone re-productions. Small 4to, cloth.....net 1.50
Gilt edge, with silk book mark, boxed.....net 2.00
Full morocco, flexible, gilt edges, round corners, boxed.....net 3.75

Pictures reflecting the best in sacred art from Raphael to the present day are scattered profusely through the book.

"To many the life of the Christ will be a new book in this form. Though beyond the introduction it contains no word except what is found in the four Gospels, yet when read continuously, without the breaks necessarily made by the different stories of the four evangelists, the narrative takes on new force and lifelikeness. The very fact that this is not our usual method of reading the Word will give it a new reality."—Golden Rule.

A GIFT OF LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D.

Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects.

By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON.

IN BRIEF.

Mighty is commerce. The city of Manchester, England, determined that she would be a seaport, and dispute with Liverpool for commercial honors, and now, after twelve years of effort and expenditure of eighty million dollars, she has completed a canal twenty-six feet deep, one hundred and twenty feet wide and thirty-five miles long out to the wide sea. It is a stupendous piece of work.

Who would suppose that in aiming a heavy piece of ordnance regard must be had to the effect of the earth's rotation? It is a fact that such an effect is appreciable, and the exact nature and extent is an important point of study with artillery experts. In a paper recently read before the Royal Artillery Institution, an expert told of the results of a number of interesting experiments. Firing from north to south, there is a divergence of projectiles to the left, due to the earth's rotation; and firing due north, the divergence is to the right. The extent of this variation varies at different points on the earth's surface, and with projectiles fired at different speeds and elevations. In England a deflection of five inches is found to occur with the projectile of a 12-pounder in a 4,000-yard range.—Blue and Gray.

A newspaper printed at Dolores, Argentine Republic, which is situated near the volcanic region, gives an account of a mysterious shower of stones which fell near that city few weeks ago. The stones are said to have fallen as thick as hail, and varied in size from a pebble to a very respectable boulder. Incalculable damage was done to the crops, tall trees were shivered to atoms, barns and outhouses were demolished, and many domestic animals were killed. In some localities the ground was covered with the bodies of wild geese and hawks, which appeared to have been killed during their flight in the air. Several persons were struck and badly injured while at work in the fields, and in the city itself, which missed the violence of the shower, one dwelling was wrecked. The stones are said to have fallen continuously for more than a minute.

TO KEEP HER YOUTH, a woman must keep her health. All the "beautifiers" in the world won't do as much for you as Dr. Pierce's Favorite Prescription. With that, you can see the good that's done, as well as feel it. That regulates all the womanly functions, improves your digestion, enriches your blood, brings refreshing sleep, and builds up, strengthens, and repairs every part of your system.

In every one of the "female complaints" and weaknesses that make women old and miserable, the "Prescription" will certainly cure. It's the only guaranteed remedy. If it doesn't benefit or cure, in the case of every weak or suffering woman, she'll have her money back.

You pay only for the good you get.

There's the very best evidence that Dr. Sage's Catarrh Remedy will cure your Catarrh. It's this promise, made by the makers of the medicine: "If your Catarrh can't be cured, no matter what your case is, we'll pay you $500."

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 22, 1894.

ARBITRATION FOR THE SETTLEMENT OF LABOR TROUBLES.

At the eighth convention of the National Association of Master Builders in Boston, last week, the delegates were addressed by Carroll D. Wright on the relations of employer and workman; and two sessions were fully occupied with the discussion of the subject which followed.

In this Mr. Gindele, of Chicago, took a prominent part. He said that arbitration bodies containing representatives of both parties to a controversy had done away with strikes and lockouts in Chicago. Mr. McCarthy, of Chicago, said that the curse of the country was too much legislation, and especially too great a number of general laws about arbitration. For example, he thought that arbitration would be equally valuable in all parts of the country.

There is a growing disposition, if possible, to adopt arbitration as a remedy in all labor disputes. Such a course is calculated to throw the blame of obstinacy and malice upon those to whom it belongs, and to lead to the cultivation of desirable harmony between employers and employes.

THE A. P. A. IN WISCONSIN.

Reports read at the A. P. A. convention in Milwaukee, Wis., show that the association has a membership of more than 5,000 in Wisconsin. The names of the officers elected have been learned, with the exception of the vice-president, who is said to be a Milwaukee attorney named Hopkins. The president is D. B. Cheney, a clergyman of West Superior, and Geo. D. Frey, Jr., of Milwaukee, is the secretary. He was formerly engaged in the life insurance business, but now finds it profitable to devote his entire time to the order. The chaplain is Rev. J. H. McManus, a Methodist minister of Washburn. Hugh Rogers, the Secretary of State, is a well-to-do lumberman, whose home is in Tomahawk. William M. Cowles, the treasurer, is a bank clerk at Whitewater. The sergeant-at-arms is L. L. Thayer, an Oshkosh school-teacher. Robert L. Rudolph, the guard, is a Milwaukee saloon-keeper. E. H. Whittier, of Kaukauna, the sentinel, is the foreman of the Chicago and Northwestern blacksmith shop. The platform is similar to the one adopted by the A. P. A. of Illinois.

The State association, it is said, has decided to support its lodge lecturer, Sims, when he returns to Kaukauna again; and, as the people of that city say they will not allow him to repeat his insults to Catholics, a conflict is expected.

SUICIDE OF A FREEMASON.

Samuel A. Brown, a blacksmith and tool-maker, residing at Springfield, Mass., on the 1st inst. shot himself with a Winchester rifle, and died. The reasons for his self-destruction are given in a letter which he left for the information of those whom it might concern. It is as follows:

I am discouraged; no home, no work, no money. I have seen better days. I have had a great deal of sickness; not been able to work but little for the past year, and now my money is gone, and no prospect of a job at present to earn any more. I am of that age, 62, that I shall not be able to work much longer, therefore it would be best that I were dead. If I should go out of existence, some one would see that I am buried. I belong to the F. and A. M., and would refer you to Chapman Beach.

Documents were also found showing that he belonged to Keystone Lodge of Masons of Grafton, Vt., and the Secretary, Sydney Holmes, was notified by telegram. Mr. Holmes replied, stating that the lodge would bear the expenses of burial. In Brown's trunk—clothing, silverware, some photographs and other articles were found. He had been separated from his first wife, and his second one died many years ago. So far as was known he had no relatives or friends, and his loneliness probably did much to make his mind unsettled. Brown had borne a good character, and was a hard-working and fairly frugal man.

These particulars we gather from the report of the Springfield Republican, and they furnish a text upon which a friend of Rev. J. P. Stoddard bases, in a letter, the following sermon on Masonic charity:

"DEAR SIR AND BROTHER:—I enclose a clipping from the Springfield Republican, which explains itself. It is only another illustration of the boasted benevolence and charity of secret societies which came too late. In Springfield there are about two thousand Masons, every one of whom has, in the Master's degree, taken the following obligation: 'I will aid and assist all poor, destitute, worthy Master Masons, their widows and orphans, knowing them to be such, as far as their necessities may require and my ability permit without material injury to myself and family.' Many Masons in Springfield occupy influential positions, and could easily have given this poor destitute brother employment 'without material injury to themselves.' This man had sought for work and must have asked Masons for it, as no one could look for a job in Springfield without coming in contact with Masons who could give it if they wished to do so. Yet this brother—discouraged, with no home, no work, no money, no prospect of a job—commits suicide, and after he is dead his lodge offers to bury him and sends twenty-five dollars to pay the bill. I suppose that they held their services over his body and that by the benefit of a pass, a pure and blameless life, he has gained admission into that celestial lodge above where the Supreme Grand Architect of the Universe presides; where, seated at the right hand of our Grand Master, he has been pronounced a just and upright Mason.

"Oh, what a detestable lie Masonry is, when compared with the religion of Jesus Christ!

"You may be interested to know that I have left the Odd-fellows, and severed all connections with secret societies. I shall never enter a lodge again as a member. I was a church-member before joining the lodge, but since that time I have been following afar off, until I practically denied what all lodge-men do deny, the Saviour. With the help of God, I will, in the future, live a more consistent Christian life; and as Peter, after he had denied his Lord, went out from among them in whose company he had committed that sin, and by his after-life showed his true repentance, so I have left the company in whose presence I denied my Redeemer, and with the aid of the Holy Spirit I will live closer to him. Odd-fellowship teaches some beautiful lessons. I think it is far superior to Masonry. I am thoroughly conversant with the ritual of Odd-fellowship. I have occupied all the chairs of the lodge and am a Past Grand, and I can say from personal experience that while in theory Odd-fellowship teaches some of the most noble, the most beautiful truths that can be found outside the sacred Scriptures, in practice Odd-fellowship is a miserable farce, and it degrades ten men where it elevates one."

"An old man, broken.....
Is come to lay his weary bones among ye;
Give him a little earth for charity!" —Shakespeare.

CATHOLIC SENTIMENTS.

Recent incidents indicate that Roman Catholics are not united in their opinions about the public schools. Here is a case in point, as told in one of our exchanges:

A Catholic, who was a member of the Board of Regents of the University of the State of New York, died. The duty of filling the vacancy devolves on the Legislature. One of the most able Catholic priests of the city of Brooklyn, Rev. Sylvester Malone, was proposed. But Bishop McDonnell objected and nominated one of the bitterest enemies to the the public-school system in the State. Father Malone was quite incensed at the Bishop's interference, and makes the following emphatic declaration of his own principles: "I am perfectly willing to go upon record as saying that I am in favor of free schools, and that the sooner parochial schools are wiped out the better. So far as money matters are concerned, it is time for the state to turn down the church. If a man of my ideas cannot become a regent I would prefer to see a Protestant minister."

On a different, but quite as important a subject, Canon Murnane writes as follows in the Catholic Citizen: "What use have the American people at large for Catholicity? Not one in six of them is a Catholic, nor is there much in the signs of the times to indicate that they are going to become Catholics? What use have they for our religion? Will they thank us for building big churches and convents? Do you perceive any sign of gratitude for our parochial schools? If the drunken neighborhood is the Catholic neighborhood; if the drunkard's names in the police reports are notoriously those of Catholics; if the saloon-goers and the saloonists are Catholics; if the 'boodlers' who thrive by saloon politics are Catholics; if the saloon-made paupers and tramps are Catholics, then as a moral force among men Catholicity is done for in that community; whatever individual good it may do its members, its public force for morality is nothing. Chrysostom and Bossuet, or Paul and Patrick, could not convert men to such a Catholicity; nor can twenty universities discover a truer test or a fairer one than that the tree shall be known by its fruit."

This is in accordance with the expression of Archbishop Ireland in his address at the Chicago Catholic Congress, last fall. He said: "What a fearfully large proportion of those so-called saloons are held by Catholics; and what a fearfully large proportion who lose in them their souls are children of the church!"

These are not A. P. A. or Protestant sentiments, but come from the bosom of the Church of Rome itself.

THE RIGHT TO STRIKE.

On the 26th of December, at St. Paul, a document was placed in the hands of the United States Marshal, intended to deter the engineer, firemen, conductors, trainmen and telegraph operators of the Northern Pacific railway from striking. It was issued by Judge Caldwell of the United States Circuit Court, and is in effect an injunction to keep the men from striking. It forbids them in any way to injure the property of the company, under penalty, or in any way to interfere with the legal rights of the company, or in any way interfere with men hired to take any places of strikers, or to delay passenger travel over the line of said railway. As might have been expected, this order caused great indignation among the dissatisfied employes.

Since the issue of the foregoing order, Judge Jenkins of the United States Circuit Court has issued an injunction restraining employes of the Northern Pacific railway from quitting work, and furthermore forbidding any labor organizations in this country from lending assistance to those employes.

This ruling of Judge Jenkins only increased the indignation of the labor unions and assemblies, and led to their appeal to Congress to investigate it and, if the Judge has overstepped his authority, to impeach him. Resolutions to that effect were presented to the House by the Judiciary Committee. There they have become a bone of political contention, and it is doubtful whether their adoption is possible.

In relation to this action of Congress, Mr. Wm. E. Curtis writes to the Chicago Record as follows:

I find that there is no expectation or intention to impeach Judge Jenkins, even in the minds of the most active advocates of these resolutions. They are perfectly aware that he has not committed an impeachable offence, but they propose to use this opportunity to give notice to other federal judges that they must not interfere with labor strikes. They are going to put Judge Jenkins to as much trouble and annoyance as possible and subject him to the expense of coming to Washington to make a defense and hold up his end of the investigation, simply for the purpose of furnishing an awful example to his colleagues on the bench. As one of the labor agitators admitted to-day: "We do not expect to impeach Judge Jenkins, but we do propose to teach the federal courts to let labor movements alone."

Northern Pacific receivers will oppose the motion by labor leaders for an amendment of Judge Jenkins' objectionable order.

THE A. P. A. EXPLAINED.

An interview, at Milwaukee, Wis., last week, with Henry F. Bowers, of Clinton, Iowa, the founder of the American Protective Association, is published. Mr. Bowers is between 60 and 70 years old. In answer to interrogatories, he freely gave the interviewer the following information relating to the institution:

"Some people," he said, "labor under misapprehension in regard to our association. We are not an annex to the Republican party, but only wish to prevent improper men from being elected to office. If the Democrats nominate good men there is nothing to hinder our voting for them. We fight the idea of any union of church and state and are especially solicitous to maintain public schools. We have no fight with the rank and file of the Catholic church, but do oppose those of its leaders who seek to train people so that they shall think they owe more allegiance to some foreign religious potentate or organization than to the United States, of which they are citizens. I know that the workings of the Catholic church are controlled by about six men, with headquarters in Vienna, and the Emperor of Austria at the head of them. We are opposed to all interference in secular affairs by any churches whatever, and especially to a church which will incite men to riot because an American citizen exercises his right of free speech in a public hall or place.

"The A. P. A. was organized at Clinton, March 13, 1887. It was on Sunday afternoon and I had the honor of being one of the organizers. I am intensely interested in the organization, as I was deprived of the privilege of the common schools because Jesuit influence had broken them up in Maryland at the time I was a boy of school age, and I propose to do my best to prevent the children of the present and future from suffering a similar privation."

"How many members have you now?" was asked.

"That is a question I cannot answer. We do not propose to reveal our strength to an opponent as alert as the one we have to contend with."

This explanation appears to accord well with the exposition of the A. P. A. and its obligations, printed in the Cynosure of Nov. 30 and Dec. 7, 1893. So far as the Masonic jewels of "secrecy and silence" are concerned, Mr. Bowers seems to hold them in Masonic veneration.

KIND WORDS.

The New England Secretary, writing to this office from Boston, says: "Allow me to congratulate you on the ability and good taste shown in our weekly visitor, the Cynosure. The last number I read with more than usual interest."

From Rev. J. A. Castel, pastor of St. John's church, Goldsboro, N. C.: "The Cynosure is a good paper, and doing a great and much-needed work. It ought to be in the hands of every Christian minister in the country. Long may it live and flourish! I am a Mason myself, but the harshest treatment I have ever received has been from Masons."

From C. H. Watson. Cuba, N. Y.: "I am much encouraged by the success of our cause on the consciences of the people of God. My pastor (D. H. Denison, Baptist) quietly withdrew from the Masons about six months ago, the Holy Spirit showing him, at the Cayuga Lake Assembly, last summer, in the presence of godly men, that there was a better way, as I had been trying to show him for two years."

OUR SWEDISH LUTHERAN FRIENDS.

Last Friday Secretary Phillips visited the Illinois Conference of the Augustana Synod of our Swedish Lutheran friends. This annual conference includes all of Illinois, part of Wisconsin, Michigan and Indiana.

More than two hundred delegates were gathered at Batavia, Ill. Rev. L. A. Johnson, of Rockford, was chosen president for the coming year. The address of the retiring president showed a vigorous missionary activity among the churches.

The most important question submitted to the conference was touching the secret society reform. Three men who had joined the Royal Arcanum had been expelled from the Immanuel church of Chicago. They felt aggrieved, but the majority of the conference was in favor of postponing any agitation until the meeting of the entire synod, next June, at St. Peter's, Minn.

The pastors were very emphatic in their approval of the church rule disfellowshiping lodge members. Rev. M. C. Ranseen declared that the church would never allow in its membership Freemasons, Odd-fellows, Royal Arcanum, Modern Woodman and adherents of such-like societies.

President Johnson quoted a bishop of the Methodist Episcopal church, who said: "You (Swedish Lutherans) may be thankful that you took the stand that you did in the beginning on the secret society question. We (Methodist Episcopals) are now in their hands, and cannot help ourselves."

A committee was appointed at the general synod, one year ago, to report at the next meeting of the synod, in June, on the position which the church should take towards the trade-unions. Unless a man joins a secret trade-union, it is almost impossible for him to get work, is becoming a general cry. In this is seen the beginning of the fulfillment of prophecy (Rev. 13: 17), that no man might buy or sell save he that had the mark or the name of the beast.

THE LODGE DANCE AS A FACTOR IN BENEFICENCE.

Dancing is an amusement which has never been unquestioned among Christian peoples. Among the ancients, dancing was generally the office of female slaves; among the semi-civilized peoples of the East it is still so, and these dances are fairly sampled by the disgusting exhibitions of the Plaisance, which have already been forbidden in Boston and New York. We think that the universal opinion among Christian workers is that miscellaneous dancing tends to worldliness, frivolity, and more serious evils. So far as we have information, they think that it is an amusement which should not be participated in by persons who love the Lord Jesus Christ and are seeking to establish his empire among men; but whether dancing shall be condemned wholly or not, there is no question but that the so-called 'Charity Ball' is a nuisance that should be abated. If worldly people wish to spend thousands and tens of thousands of dollars on clothes, jewelry, flowers, etc., for the purpose of mere self-gratification they ought not to label such a performance with the holy name of charity, because they give the price paid for tickets, less expenses, to certain worthy objects. Let everything travel under its own name; and, since the ball is not for charity but for the self-gratification of persons participating therein, let them avow the real object and say nothing more about it. This truth, which would seem to be self-evident at any time, is especially important just now when hundreds of thousands of honest men do not know where to get bread for their wives and children.

If men and women cannot attain to a real fellow-feeling for their brethren, let them at least not insult the suffering at a time like this with such vainglorious display under the name of beneficence.

—Rev. P. B. Williams writes from Philomath, Ore., Feb. 14: "I spoke at Shedd's, ten miles above Albany, on the 9th, and had an excellent crowd—Masons, Odd-fellows, etc. I am now in a series of meetings at Oak Ridge Presbyterian church. Two arose for prayers the first night."

—Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard delivered an able address on "Oath-bound Secrecy and its Relation to Ecclesiastical and Civil Governments" at Chicago Avenue church in this city, last Monday evening—too late for further particulars in this issue; but we hope to print it in an early number of the Cynosure.

—A new and enlarged edition of "College Secret Societies, their Customs, Character, and the Efforts for their Suppression," has just been issued and is now for sale at this office. The book, always a sterling plea against the foolishness and barbarity of College Greek-Letter fraternities, is now stronger than ever. Price, 25 cents.

—Our General Secretary, W. I. Phillips, has returned from his trip into Wisconsin, Minnesota, Washington and Oregon. Our Oregon agent, Rev. P. B. Williams, was aided to begin again the work which he had carried on so efficiently until funds failed. We trust that this will not occur again. The N. C. A. has now in trust, for the Oregon department, $2,300. Not over $500 of it, however, can be used during any one year. Brethren Simpson and Mathew have laid such a foundation that the Pacific Coast friends can build upon it a permanent work.

—Speaking of Thos. Ewing Sherman and his recent lecture on Jesuitism in this city, an attentive correspondent remarks: "To me the whole was one of the saddest things I have met in many days. It did not need much shrewdness to read behind the scenes; it was all self-evident. In the fact of Thos. E. Sherman becoming a Jesuit, there is portrayed one of the ways of 'compelling' persons and wills without physical force. A manly young man, with a manly father, he thought it more manly to subject his will to the dictation of men than to his own conscience or to his own promptings to the highest and best things, healthfully and happily. A broken body, or a 'voluntary humility,' or 'will-worship,' never made a man good, or even pleased God, but it fits men, if not to be used, 'to submit to every guidance."

—Mrs. N. Arlonine C. Brightman, well-known to our readers as an earnest reformer, is now engaged in holding a series of Eclectic Congresses on Sunday evenings, at Central Music Hall, in this city. The first one was held on the 11th inst., in which Mrs. Harbert, Dr. J. H. Kellogg, and Rev. Corydon Millard, of the Moody Institute, participated with good effect. These congresses have for their object the reformation and education of young men about town, with the view of leading them to avoid the hurtful habits to which all homeless young men are here exposed, and to adopt such methods of life and character as will tend to make them morally and physically men among men of reputation and influence. Tobacco, intemperance and vice of all kinds are denounced in these congresses, and we are gratified to learn that the attendance is large and the results seemingly satisfactory.

THE PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

Bro. Stoddard requests that all who receive bills advertising this convention will put them up in their postoffices, have them printed in their local newspapers, and circulate them among their friends. Get as many out as possible.

THE HOME.

HIS OWN.

Do you think that the Lord forgets you
  Because you must fight and pray,
And reap the sorrow harvest
  You've sown from day to day?
Do you think that he lets you suffer
  And never heeds your moan?
Ah, no! for the dear Lord Jesus
  Will never forget his own.

Do you think that because your heart aches
  With a bitter, cruel pain,
And your life's sweet happy sunshine
  Is shadowed by storm and rain,
And the music is hushed and silenced
  Till you hear but the undertone,
That the dear Lord Jesus forgets you?
  He never forgets his own.

Do you think that because your loved ones
  Are lying cold and still
Where you cannot hear their voices
  Or work their careless will,
And the struggle you've made together
  Must now be fought alone,
That the dear Lord Jesus forgets you?
  He never forgets his own.

Do you think that because the sorrow
  All human hearts must know
Has come to you or the darling
  You loved and cherished so,
And things you want have vanished,
  The things you would call your own,
That the dear Lord Jesus forgets you?
  He never forgets his own.

And we're all his own dear children,
  And he holds us all as dear
As you do the wayward baby
  Who creeps to your heart so near;
And if we will only listen
  We can hear his tender tone:
"Oh, rest in peace, my children;
  I never forget my own."

THE CONVERSION OF A HEATHEN.

One day a heathen man entered a chapel of the Methodist Episcopal church at Fuchau. The Rev. S. L. Binkley, who was preaching, said, among other things: "Jesus can save you from all sins." At the end of the service, when all others had retired, this man came forward and addressed the missionary: "Did I understand you aright? I thought you said that Jesus could save me from all sins. Is that what you said?" Mr. Binkley replied affirmatively. The Chinaman then replied: "Sir, you did not know me when you said that; for if you had you never would have said it. I have been a gambler, a sorcerer and an opium smoker for more than twenty years; and a man who smokes opium that long can never be redeemed; every one knows that. Now, if you had known all this you would not have said that Jesus could save me from all my sins, would you?" The missionary replied that he would have said just what he did, and reaffirmed that Jesus could save him from all his sins. He could not believe it, but went home to think about it, and came day after day to the missionary's house to talk to him and get more light in regard to Christianity, until one day he burst into the missionary's study without any salutation, saying: "I know it! I know that Jesus can save me from all my sins, for he has done it!" When asked as to his opium pipe he said: "I have no desire for it, nor for any of the wicked things that I have been doing. I only want to go to Hokchiang and preach to the people there that Jesus can save them from all their sins."

It was a dangerous district to visit on account of the village feuds existing, in which men were often killed. His friends tried to dissuade him from going; but he went, preaching everywhere the truth.

He was pelted with missiles, stoned in one place until he became unconscious, and afterward punished with two thousand stripes by order of a heathen magistrate on a false charge that was offered against him; but, with unwavering fidelity, he continued to preach Christ until about six hundred souls were brought into the church through his labors. After many years of faithful service he died in the triumphs of faith, saying, on Saturday night, to the brethren about him: "To-morrow morning you will be singing the Resurrection hymn in the chapel; but I will be singing with the angels of God in heaven."

This man had no previous Christian training, but was converted right out of heathendom, in adult age, and manifested the power of Christ in the entire renovation of his being.

There are thousands of such in the foreign mission fields of the various churches.—S. L. Baldwin, D.D., in the Independent.

HE SLEPT WELL.

He was a stranger in the city, and had arrived by the evening train. Tired and dusty he hurried to the principal hotel, and was disappointed at not being able to secure a room. The hotel was filled to overflowing with cots in the parlors, all engaged. A great convention was in session in the city; and as he went to the other hotels he found the same diffiulty; not a room, nor even a cot could he secure. At last, at a third-rate hotel, he found he could secure a bed in a double room. He tried to hire both beds, so that he could have the whole room, not liking the idea of a room-mate in such a place. But the other bed had been hired, and so he was obliged to take his chances. He went upstairs, and after retiring, concluded that he would not go to sleep—at least not until he had seen what kind of a man was to occupy the other bed. In order to keep awake, as he was both tired and sleepy, he took out his pocket Bible and soon became deeply interested in a Bible reading that had lately attracted his attention. He was engaged in this study when the door suddenly opened, and in came the stranger who was to be his room-mate for the night. The man, as he entered, gave a sharp glance at him, and then went across the room and prepared for bed. Looking over the top of his Bible, he quietly studied the stranger. The man appeared to be a quiet person and seemed to be honest. Still he hesitated about trusting a stranger, and began to make calculations about keeping awake. But he changed his mind, for he saw the stranger, who was ready to retire, quietly kneel down in a manner that showed it to be a familiar custom, and engage in prayer. That was enough; he put the Bible under his pillow, and went off himself into quiet, refreshing sleep. In the morning, while they were dressing, he turned to the stranger, and explaining the circumstances of the past evening, said: "So I slept well." The stranger listened attentively, and then said: "I slept well, too. I had not expected to sleep at all in this place with one I did not know in the other bed, but when I came in so suddenly, and found you reading your Bible, I concluded I could trust that book, and so said my prayers and went to sleep." It is a glorious truth that man trusts his fellowman who believes and trusts in the living God, and who accepts, trusts and obeys the Bible. Is there any other book that possesses such a character, and so carries in itself the proof of a divine origin and living power? God's word in the hearts of men means, indeed, "Peace on earth."—Selected

FARMERS' WIVES IN INDIA.

Miss Jeanne Serabji, of Bombay, spoke in the recent agricultural congress for the women of India, and said in part: I had the pleasure not very long ago of speaking of the educated women of India. I have now another phase of womanhood to bring before you, those of the agricultural class, who though not educated in fine arts, can still be useful to the world at large. Women whose physiques are a novelty to behold—strong, healthy, well-built working women, who are able to stand the hardship of rain and storms, clouds and sunshine—who are the bread-winners of families and who live to a grand old age in consequence of their toil—these women in ploughing season live in small huts on the scene of their labors. They rise in the small hours of the morning, cook the food for the day's consumption, go out some miles for water for drinking purposes, and then begin their work on the fields, leaving their infants tied up in white cloths by shady nooks under the bush, where, having been well dosed with opium, they lie for hours without moving; indeed, very often it happens that the mothers are too busy to return to their infants until the noonday sun gives way to the light of the moon. The husbands work, too, side by side with their wives, and so do the children, little boys and girls tilling and sowing and ploughing the ground in the different seasons as they come around, each one carrying his or her own burden until the harvest, and then on the first day of gathering in there is a grand festival equal to the Thanksgiving day in Christian lands, when the idols are taken in procession through the streets.

KEEP A CLEAN MOUTH.

A distinguished author says: "I resolved, when I was a child, never to use a word which I could not pronounce before my mother." He kept his resolution and became a pure-minded, noble, honored gentleman. His rule and example are worthy of imitation.

Boys readily learn a class of low, vulgar words and expressions, which are never heard in respectable circles. Of course we cannot think of girls as being so much exposed to this peril. We cannot imagine a decent girl using words she would not utter before her father or mother.

Such vulgarity is thought by some boys to be "smart," the "next thing to swearing," and yet "not so wicked;" but it is a habit which leads to profanity, and fills the mind with evil thoughts. It vulgarizes and degrades the soul, and prepares the way for many of the gross and fearful sins which now corrupt society.

Young readers, keep your mouths free from all impurity, and your "tongue from evil;" but in order to do this, ask Jesus to cleanse your heart and keep it clean, for "out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh."

A NOBLE BOYHOOD.

"I would be willing to die, too, if people would mourn for me as they do for Garfield," a young boy said in my hearing one of those days that the murdered President lay in state at the Capitol of the nation.

Some of the interest centered in him arose from the fact that he commenced life a poor boy. Twenty-five years ago, after the battle of Big Sandy River, President Lincoln asked a distinguished officer why Garfield, in two weeks, did what it would have taken one of the regular officers two months to accomplish?

"Because he was not educated at West Point," the General remarked, laughing.

"No," said Mr. Lincoln, "that was not the reason; it was because when he was a boy he had to work for a living."

Beginning with the canal-boat, he was not ashamed to ring bells and sweep to pay his way through college; nor did he ever gain a single round up the ladder of fame without working for it. He hesitated at nothing that was honorable so long as he could make it serve his purpose of getting on. He said once: "If hard work is not another name for talent, it is the best possible substitute for it."

Good and bad traits of character are developed in early life.

To be noble men you must be brave, true, Christian boys.—Anonymous.

CHILD-STORIES.

A poor woman entered the parlor of a lady for whom she had sometimes worked. She led by the hand a little boy, poorly clad, and of a sad countenance. To the questions addressed to her, she mournfully replied:

"He is my child. His father has been dead since he was a baby. Six months since, I married again. He seems not to be welcome to his new father. It grows worse and worse. Sometimes he goes hungry, and sometimes he is badly beaten."

Then weeping, she added: "I cannot deny that my husband, now and then, drinks too much. Then it is bad for us both, but worst of all for the poor boy. When I go out to work, I cannot leave him at home, for fear he might be killed while I am gone. The people who hire me do not like me to bring a child with me. Oh, dear madame, will you not let him live with you? Take him, I pray, and do what you will with him, for our misery is great. I feel that I cannot live long, and my only fear of death is, that I must leave him alone to suffer. Oh, lady! lady! you, whose two sweet children are in the grave, have pity upon us."

And as the boy looked timidly up, there was a large, round tear on each blue eye, like a dew-drop upon a violet. The heart of the bereaved one yearned over him, and she bade the poor mother bring him again to-morrow. That night she consulted her husband, and he said: "Do as thou wilt in this matter, for the Lord is with thee."

The next morning, the sad pair presented themselves. The lady took the child by the hand, and said: "I will he a mother to him. So help me, God." The poor woman fell on her knees and praised the Lord, saying, that now she was ready to die in peace.

The boy was overjoyed to find that a bath, and a suit of neat clothes, and a comfortable meal awaited him. Still more oppressed was he with wonder when the gentleman came home, and he was told he might call him father. He bowed himself low, as he utteredthe word, and, turning to his kind benefactress, whispered:

"He will not beat me when he gets back to-night, will he?"

When he was led, at retiring, to a little chamber, and a nicer bed than, perhaps, he had ever before seen, he kneeled beside it, as his poor mother had taught him, and murmured,—

"What shall I say? Oh, what shall I say? My old prayers won't do."

So filled was he with amazement and gratitude, that his few words were in sobs:

"Oh, good Lord! good Lord! Take care of poor mother, and don't ever let me go back any more."

His zeal to serve and please those who so nobly sheltered him, knew no bounds. "What shall I do for you, my lady—mother, I mean. Please let me do something."

His earnest application in learning to read, and committing verses and hymns, created some anxiety, lest his health should suffer. His judicious foster-mother devised modes of exercise and light labor for him, and wished to allure him to athletic plays; but he never seemed so happy as when near her side.

On one occasion, as here turned from an errand she had given him, he ran in with unwonted speed, exclaiming:

"Oh, ma'am, ma'am—dear mother, I mean—I have seen a poor, little boy, whose father drinks. Do take him to live with you. He shall have half my bread and my bed. I will give him all my toys, and cakes, when I get them, for I know he never has any. Oh, please, please say yes." Then lowering his voice to a whisper, and with a most imploring face, he added:

"You can't think how dreadful it is to be dragged up when you're asleep in the night, and whipped, when you have not been a naughty boy."

He was fond of repeating to himself, after he had retired, passages from the Bible, which he committed to memory. It would seem that he dwelt most upon those which seemed to have reference to his own past, or present condition. He was heard many times to say in his solitary apartment, with tender intonations:

"I was brought low, and He helped me."

The excellent pair who extended to him their kind protection, felt for the amiable child a true parental regard. God's blessing seemed to descend into their hearts, and comfort them for the children they had lost, with a quiet joy in the one they had found. Yet they could not repress their anxiety at the increasing indications of his failing health. Whether it was the result of a naturally feeble constitution, or of the hardships he had endured from an intemperate man's tyranny, the physicians were not agreed. His poor mother had died a few months after his adoption. It was God's will that in less than a year he should follow her. Every care that skill and affection could devise was lavished on the orphan, but in vain.

When so weak as to be unable to walk, he steadfastly regarded the bed on which he was laid, and said:

"Is this my death-bed? my death-bed?"

He seemed to have imbibed the impression that it would differ in aspect from other places of repose, having heard it spoken of with solemnity Having scanned it with attention, he laid down his head, repeating:

"Jesus can make a dying bed Feel soft, as downy pillows are."

To his kind foster-mother, as she watched over him, he said, once at midnight:

"I shall go to your boy and girl. Will they be angry with me, because I lived in their house, and used some of their playthings? Will they kiss me and hold out their hand to me as you do?"

The work of death was lingering, and severe,—but he was patient and lamb-like. He seemed to have no will of his own. All that troubled him was to see the grief of his parents.

"Oh, sir, my good father—dear mother, don't cry, don't cry. It is all light overhead. The Saviour will save me."

And so, the gentle orphan, whose short life had comprised so much of sorrow and of joy, went home to the Father of his spirit. Tenderly loved, and truly mourned was he, by those who had nobly rescued him from penury and injustice; and in his brief course of budding loveliness and fervent gratitude, they found full payment for their liberality. But a rapturous plaudit awaits them hereafter, from lips divine: "Inasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye have done it unto me."

PARABLES.

Earth brings her parables of loss and gain
In boldest speech.
Yet heights sublime, which spirits shall attain,
She cannot reach.
Aerial whispers float o'er land and sea—
"It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

Her royal purples, and her crowns of gold,
Her white attire,
The sceptered lilies, which her summers hold,
With flames afire—
All fail to show the glory we shall see—
"It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

Who, from unsightly bulb or slender root,
Could guess aright
The glory of the flower, the fern, the fruit,
In summer's height?
Through tremulous shadows voices call to me—
"It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

Triumphant guesses from the seer and sage
Through shadows dart
And tender meanings on the poet's page
Console the heart.
O songs prophetic! though sweet are ye,
"It doth not yet appear what we shall be."

—Clara Thwaitse.

TEMPERANCE.

WHY TOTAL ABSTINENCE IS BEST.

1. It is easier to practice total abstinence than it is to break off the habit of indulgence. When once bound, how few are able to break the chain of intemperance! An occasional John B. Gough may be found, but they are scarce. The chances are all against the drunkard. You may count them lost by the wholesale.

In the book of Proverbs we find Solomon addressing, not the drunkard, but his son, who had not yet taken his first social glass. In like manner we should spend our best energies in shielding the youth from the grasp of intemperance. Not only teach them the evil of intemperance and the horrible doom of its victims, but strive to remove the temptation from their reach. They are only safe when this is done.

What would you think of a man who, for a small sum of money, would permit others to keep adders and snakes in the community, exposing all to their ravages? Could he complain if he and his were bitten? How much better is the community that, for a small sum of money, allows saloons in its midst, to furnish that which is worse than the bite of an adder?

2. Total abstinence is best because "wine is deceitful." Like the forbidden fruit, there is an attraction about it. This is true of every sin. If sin had no pleasure it would have no power. By its deceitfulness, it lures men into its power and holds them.

Think of Addison, Coleridge and hosts of others who were slaves in the fetters of intoxication. Men never know what a dread future there is in the first glass of wine. Silently and steadily it advances upon its unsuspecting victim until it has him completely in its power. All are not thus deceived. If they were, the vessel of state would go down. Though she still boldly breasts the wave, yet the drunkards, a swelling, inert mass of brutalized humanity, lie so heavily in the hold that progress is retarded.

How came all these into that condition of shame and wretchedness? Ask these many thousands of mindless, hopeless inebriates; ask them one by one, and they will all tell you, and tell you truly, that they did not intend to sink into that condition, but were beyond recovery ere they were aware of their danger. You are strong; you feel your footing firm; so did they. "Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall." The Bible warns you that "wine is deceitful."

These warnings apply with augmented force to us. Their force is intensified when brought to bear on the power of modern intoxicants to mock their victims. If the fruit of his own vine sometimes chastises the unwary Israelite with whips, the fiery products of our distilleries chastise the nation with scorpions. The little finger of strong drink in modern times is thicker than the loins of its father and representative in the days of Solomon. The deceits it practices are legion, and legion, too, are the unwise "who are deceived thereby." The deceiver is in the midst of its deceits. To fall its victim is to commit a crime against the physical man. But the worst sting of the serpent, strong drink, is not felt in this world, and for this reason: because drunkenness furnishes a sure pass to eternal woe, for "no drunkard shall inherit the kingdom of God."

3. Total abstinence is best because cold water is all that we need. It has been tested. In the army and on the sea; in expeditions to the frigid and torrid zones, cold-water men have proved themselves superior to those who used intoxicants. Horace Greeley was a cold-water man, and what editor, in his day, wielded a greater influence or surpassed him as a journalist? Daniel was a cold-water man. Water and pulse formed his diet. He was fairer than those who ate the king's meat and drank his wine. He was the kind of a young man God chose to be his oracle. He reached his three score years and ten, and even more, and rose to the highest place of power and influence in the kingdom.

Cold water creates no appetite, sets no bad examples, incites to no crime, and works no wreck in man. Cold water is God's gift to man. Crystal, fresh, and sparkling, it satisfies the taste. It quenches the thirst. Happy he who is contented with it; who puts into practice total abstinence from all intoxicating beverages.—New Republic.

WORDS WELL-SPOKEN.

To-morrow is the day on which all the drunkards mean to reform, the idlers to go to work, and the sinners to repent.—Christian Advocate, Nashville.

Either drunkenness will be destroyed in this country, or the American government will be destroyed. Drunkenness and free institutions are coming into a death grapple.—T. DeWitt Talmage.

But however highly this tribe of people may think of themselves, a drunken man is a greater monster than any that is to be found among all the creatures which God has made, as indeed there is no character which appears more despicable and deformed in the eyes of all reasonable persons than that of a drunkard.—Addison.

Under all forms of license, the people have every facility to get drunk, and the young every temptation to drink. License is practical "free rum." Prohibition unenforced could be no worse. But it properly defines the business and keeps our hands clear of the price of blood.—Dr. J. M. Buckley, in the Christian Advocate, Oct. 4, 1892.

I do not overstate it when I say that the 200,000 saloons in this country have been instrumental in destroying more human lives in the last five years than the 2,000,000 armed men did during the four years of the civil war. Whisky is a more deadly weapon than shot or shell or any of the implements of our improved modern warfare. —Hon. William Windom.

From extensive acquaintance with many lands, I unhesitatingly affirm that everywhere God has provided pure water for man, and that the wines drunk are often miserable and dirty. I have found water everywhere that I have traveled—in China and India, Palestine and Egypt—and everywhere water has been my beverage.—Thomas Cook, the Tourist.

A prison chaplain very tersely said: "Crime is simply condensed alcohol."

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Jacob and Esau's boyhood. Vs. 27, 28. In these twin boys we see opposite natures developing with their growth. Esau loved the pleasures of the chase. He was as fond of wild adventure as Jacob of the quiet life of a simple herdsman, dwelling in tents. That Esau should be Isaac's favorite may seem strange, unless we remember the attraction which totally dissimilar natures often have for each other. Rebekah's partiality for Jacob may have had its root in her mother's ambition. She seems to have understood by the prophecy made at their birth that Jacob was the son in whom the magnificent promises made to Abraham were to be fulfilled; and this accounts, no doubt, for the unwarranted way in which she tried to hurry Providence instead of waiting for the slow unfolding of God's designs. Favoritism in families is sure to beget discord and division, as in the case before us. It makes impossible the right training of children. Jacob and Esau seem to have grown up without any attempt to repress their individual faults or bring out their individual good qualities. The tendency to underhandedness and deceit in the one, and the lack of conscientious principle in the other, was not reproved in the child or the boy, and in manhood wrecked the happiness both of Isaac and Rebekah.

2. Jacob's proposal. Vs. 29–31. "And Jacob sod pottage," made of the lentile or small Egyptian or Syrian bean. Fausset and Brown, in their commentary, think it was probably the Egyptian bean procured by Jacob as a dainty, with which Esau seems not to have been familiar. His brother's request for some of the pottage would have been granted at once without any thought of bargain-driving had Jacob been a generous-minded man. But he was not. Without doubt his mother had made him familiar with the prophecy that he was eventually to supplant his brother, and thus sowed the evil seed which brought forth such bitter fruit for them both. "Sell me this day thy birthright." Jacob must have thoroughly weighed his brother's character before daring to make such a proposal. It shows the lack of self-control, love of present indulgence, and contempt of future good that must be bought by temporary self-denial which formed the basis of Esau's character. "And Esau said, Behold, I am at the point to die." This does not mean, as the ordinary reader might understand it, that he was on the brink of starvation, but that he was daily risking his life in the dangers of the chase, and, in the event of his death, he asks with careless flippancy, "What profit shall this birthright do to me?" His reasoning was that of a weak, ease-loving and ill-balanced mind; but it was more and worse than this. It was giving up his position as priest of the family, a dignity which always descended to the elder son; it was giving up his inheritance as the progenitor of the chosen Seed; it was, in short, a surrender of all the blessings, temporal and spiritual, to which he was the rightful heir through his grandfather Abraham. Thus Esau despised his birthright. But there are many Esaus in our land to-day who sell their birthright for even less than he did. He sold his for wholesome food; they for alcoholic poison. Like him, they "walk after the sight of their eyes." They "look upon the wine when it is red," and give, for the draught of death, reputation, fortune, character, intellect—all that makes life worth living here, as well as the hope of a blessed hereafter. The worth of what they give up cannot be computed. A man would be called idiotic or insane who gave up an empire for a good dinner; but what shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul? That is the utter, the irremediable loss.

Several important lessons are here suggested. 1. Character is one of the strongest safeguards against temptation. They will not often be troubled by evil suggestions who keep themselves habitually above the level of such things. It was said of Charles Sumner that through all his long career in Congress, no one ever dared to approach him with a bribe. 2. The sin and folly of Esau consisted in grasping a temporary indulgence, careless of his future and lasting good. This is the characteristic, not of a reasonable, thinking being, but of the beasts which perish, whose desires and hopes are all bounded by one short life. 3. Esau had no right to sell his birthright; so no man has the right to sell his character, his soul, that which divides him from the brute creation for the highest earthly good—much less for a mess of pottage.

3. The bargain concluded. Vs. 33, 34. "And Jacob said, Swear to me this day." This was no small sin, both in Jacob to ask and Esau to grant. It was an insult to Jehovah to call upon him to witness such a transaction, so dishonorable in Jacob—so infamous in Esau. Like the oaths of the lodge-room, it was extra-judicial. Jacob had no right to swear Esau, nor had Esau any right to allow himself to be sworn by Jacob. "And he rose up and went his way." The expression is very significant. No regret over his folly; no repenting of his rash bargain. That time came later. So they who have started on a career of sensual pleasure may not feel at first the bitterness of remorse, but their hour of fruitless repentance is sure to come.

LITERATURE.

THE BIBLE DEFENDED: A Review of Paine's "Age of Reason" and Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses," "Lecture on Skulls," etc.; with Ample Quotations from both Infidel and Christian Writers; being an Answer and Rebuke to Infidel Questions and Atheistic Assertions. By R. S. Webber. One vol., paper, pp. 339. Boston: H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill. Price, 50 cents.

This book is an important addition to Hastings' Anti-Infidel Library, and in every way commends itself to Christian workers and all who desire to believe the truth as it is in God's Word and plan of salvation. The author makes no claim to originality; but brings together in admirable form the testimony in favor of the Bible from the most prominent authors. It is comprehensive in detail, strong in argument and convincing in its conclusions. The popular objections to Bible miracles are ably met, and the outward and internal evidence of the truth of the Scriptures is presented in an excellent manner for family or closet perusal.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

Lovers of the science of astronomy who desire to keep abreast with the developments which the improvements of the age are making from month to month will find much of interest in the February number (122) of Astronomy and Astro-Physics. In general astronomy it presents papers of the following import: On the Physical Constitution of the Planet Jupiter, by G. W. Hough; Light-Waves and their Application to Metrology (illusteated), by A. A. Michelson; West Indian Hurricanes and Solar Magnetic Influence, by H. A. Hazen; Free Public Observatories, by W. W. Payne; Obituary Notices of Drs. Rudolf Wolf, Adolphe Steinhell, and Friedrich Gustav von Bulow. In the department of Astro-Physics we have: The Solar Faculæ, by Geo. E. Hale; On Two Great Protuberances (discovered on the sun), illustrated, by J. Fenyi, S. J.; On a Certain Law in the Spectra of Some of the Elements, by C. Runge; On the Motion of Hercules in the Line of Sight, by A. Belopolsky; On the New Star in Auriga (2 papers,) by H. C. Vogel and H. Seeliger; Astro-Physical Notes; Current Celestial Phenomena, and News and Notes. Published at Carleton College, Northfield, Minn. Published ten times a year for $4.00.

Dr. M. L. Holbrook's Journal of Hygiene for Februrary, it seems to us, is one of the best numbers of this excellent magazine yet issued. Its contents are replete with interest and usefulness. They are as follows: The Ethical and Hygienic Value of Water, by Dr. Chas. H. Shepard; Bread-making Among the Shakers, by Martha J. Anderson; An Old Allegory Rewritten—a capital adaptation; Hygiene for Women, by Jennie Chandler, including the Spectra of Heredity, Our Boys and Tobacco, Relaxing Exercise for Women, A Beautiful Voice at 77 Years, Hygiene of the Bed, and the Perfection of Lemonade; Notes Concerning Health (No. 28), by the editor, embracing a new installment of The Perfect Man, Tyndall's Habits and Love of Life, Bread and Teeth, Chloral-taking, Low Spirits, Olive Oil and its Healthfulness, Eat More Fruit and Less Meat, The Cheap and Wholesome Feeding of the Poor; Elizabeth P. Peabody; Chas. S. Royce; The Mixing of Races; Book Notices, etc. New York: M. L. Holbrook, 46 East 21st street. Price, 10 cents.

The Cottage Hearth for February presents the following pleasant table of contents: The Idyl of a Queen, illustrated, by Gisela A. Dittrick; "Jim's Little Girls," illustrated, by Marjorie Richardson; Love-in-a-Mist, illustrated, by Kate D. Sweetzer; Zodomirsky's Duel, by Alex. Dumas; The Rise of Winthrop Sears, illustrated, by Percy Lampry; The Post Office at Creede; The Front of St. Peterborough Cathedral, illustrated, by Oscar Fay Adams; Faith, by C. E. Benton, and the eight well-filled domestic and miscellaneous departments.

PAMPHLETS.

"Powers, Duties and Obligations of the City of Chicago, with Respect to its Streets," is a handsome pamphlet from the press of Donohue & Henneberry, containing a variety of decisions by the State Supreme Court and other tribunals upon this subject. There are so many abuses in this direction—such a grabbing for illegal franchises by speculators and corporations, that the information here furnished is of great value to taxpayers as a means of defence against undue greed and rapacity.

The Eleventh Annual Report of the Executive Committee of the Indian Rights Association for the year ending Dec. 15, 1893, contains a large amount of desirable intelligence touching the civilizing and educational work now being performed among the Indians in the Western Territories. The magnitude of this work, and the interest shown in its prosecution, with the gratifying results arising from its accomplishment, form an important chapter in our national economy. Those who desire to acquaint themselves with it can obtain copies by writing to the Indian Rights Association, No. 1305 Arch street, Philadelphia, Pa.

The Illinois State Institution for the Education of the Deaf and Dumb was organized more than fifty years ago, and since that time has steadily carried on the education of children whose deafness prevents them from receiving instruction in common schools. The results are no less surprising than the excellence of the system provided for tuition in literary, industrial, moral and religious branches of learning. The beautifully printed and illustrated Prospectus, in pamphlet form (manufactured in the institution), gives full particulars of this judicious State charity—for it is free to pupils, being supported by a general tax upon the people—and may be obtained by sending to S. T. Walker, M. A., Superintendent, Jacksonville, Illinois.

"The Common Weal and the News-stand," by Josiah W. Leeds, Rocouncey, Pa., is a powerful appeal to all reputable people to assist in the prevention of printing and distributing of bad literature, by which the morals of the young are corrupted and crime is increased. The subject demands prompt and thorough action, as any one may see by reading this forcible plea for the suppression of licentious books and papers on the streets and cars, in news-depots, and elsewhere. The pamphlet may be obtained from the author.

MUSIC.

J. Fischer & Bro., No. 7 Bible House, New York, have sent us three new sacred pieces, which are worthy the attention of all church singers. Lead Kindly Light. Duet for soprano and alto, or soprano and baritone, By J. Wiegand. Price, each, 40 cents. Wake Ye that Sleep. Soprano, solo and chorus. By M. A. Melvil. Price, 20 cents. Jesus Christ is Risen To-day. (Anthem.) Solo and chorus. By M. A. Melvil. Price, 20 cents. They are compositions of merit, and will answer equally well for church and home use, especially for festal occasions. The authors' names and reputation are of long-established standing.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

MR. MOODY'S WORK.

—It is reported that Mr. D. L. Moody was much concerned about means, on account of the present financial panic, to carry on his great work, involving an expense of hundreds of dollars every day. He went forward, however, trusting that the Lord would provide. While thus exercised, he one day received a letter from Rockford, Ill., stating that $10,000 had been raised for his work and would be sent in time for his need. The expectations of faith founded on God's promises never fail.

ROMAN CATHOLICS.

—In advance sheets of Hoffmann's forthcoming Directory of the Catholic Church in the United States the following statistics occur: Archbishops, 17; bishops, 71; clergymen, 9,717; churches, 8,729; stations and chapels, 5,704; universities, 8; seminaries, 86; students, 3,533; high schools, 840; parochial schools, 3,732; children attending 765,188; orphan asylums, 258; orphans, 29,526; total children attending, 860,356; Catholic population, 8,502,033.

—From the monastery of the Three Fountains near Rome, the Trappist Father, Very Reverend Edmund Obrecht, O. C. R., has come to the United States to appeal for aid for that community, which has been robbed by the Italian government, has been decimated by swamp fever, and is burdened with a debt of $300,000. An alms of any amount will secure to the donor a share in the benefits of two masses said daily at La Trappe for the living and the dead, etc.—Catholic Review.

FRIENDS.

—"Buffalo Bill" (Hon. Wm. F. Cody) announced, a few days ago, that he has been negotiating with the Philadelphia Friends with a view of establishing a colony on his ranch near North Platte, Neb., where he owns four thousand acres of land, said to have rich soil and to be well-watered. This land he will divide into small holdings with a family on each.

HOME AND HEALTH.

CARE IN DIPHTHERIA.

As diphtheria is so very serious a disease, whenever a child seems languid and miserable, fretful and depressed, without apparent cause, examine the throat carefully, writes Elisabeth Robinson Scovil in a very valuable article on "Care in Infectious Diseases' in the February Ladies' Home Journal. If it is swollen and covered with patches of gray membrane looking like slate-pencil dust, send for the doctor. It is always safest to have medical advice when the throat is affected.

Until the doctor comes keep the child in bed. If the throat is painful procure a lump of lime, pour cold water upon it; when the effervescence subsides strain off the clear water and apply it to the throat with a brush or swab. If the child is old enough the throat can be gargled with lime-water. Inhaling the steam from a pitcher of boiling water sometimas gives relief. The neck may be rubbed with warm oil and bound with flannel.

Milk, either hot or cold, should be given every two hours. The cold milk may have the white of an egg shaken with each cupful. Strong beef-tea can be given and the doctor may order stimulant. The strength must be supported by nourishing liquid food.

HONEY AS FOOD.

Many people are aware that honey, either simple or prepared in combination with other ingredients, is a desirable medical agent in certain cases, as in diseases of the throat, especially those of a mild nature, like hoarseness and a dry, inflamed condition; but not so many are aware that as a regular article of food it has a prophylactic and even a therapeutic value which can scarcely be overestimated. Most sweets are to be taken with caution, as they are liable to impair the action of the stomach, or otherwise injuriously affect the system; but honey may at any time be eaten freely, according to the taste of the recipient, and will be found both corrective and beneficial. In some cases, especially where the appetite has been pampered and demoralized by hurtful indulgence in unwholesome sweets or other foods, the taste for honey will need to be cultivated; but it will almost invariably grow with the restoration of the general physical tone, and become an individual characteristic.

An obedience to the simple laws of hygiene and the use of Ayers's Sarsaparilla will enable the most delicate man or sickly woman to pass in ease and safety from the icy atmosphere of February to the warm, moist days of April. It is the best of spring medicines.

They're going to pieces both the women who wash, and the things that are washed, in theold-fashioned way. That constant rub, rub, rub, over the washboard does the business. Rubbing is hard work. Rubbing wears out the clothes. There's nothing of the kind, if you'll let Pearline do the washing.

All you'll have to do, then, is to look after it. It'll save all this work and rubbing that does so much harm. But, because Pearline makes washing easy, you needn't be afraid that it isn't safe. That idea is worn out. Just as your clothes will be, unless you use Pearline. 385

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' aid 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'!"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

What Others Say of Us.

"There is no Seedsman in America that enjoys a sounder reputation for square dealing and conscientious claims for the seed he offers. His Catalogue makes no pretense of captivating by tawdry colored pictures, or inflated windy phraseology. It aims to guide, not to bewilder, its readers."
—(From Editorial in Rural New Yorker.)

To all in search of this kind of a Vegetable and Flower Seed Catalogue, we shall be happy to send it free. You will find in it, probably, a larger variety of some kinds of Vegetable Seed than is in any Catalogue published in this country or Europe; many of the more costly we raise on our four seed farms. There are pages of Novelties, from which the humbug has been winnowed out.

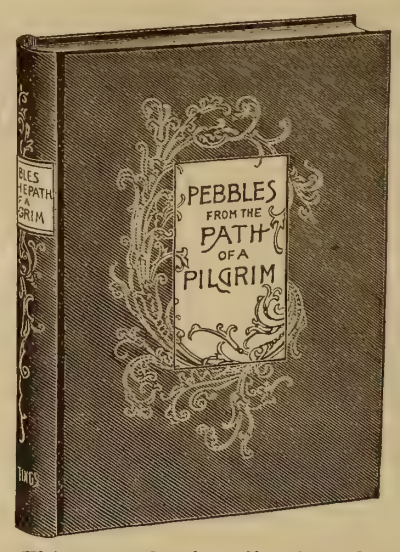
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches it with an earnestness born of conviction.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,

BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by persuing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatising on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FARM NOTES.

The North American Bee-Keepers' Association recommends that apiarian societies of the various States memorialize their respective legislatures to enact laws that shall forbid the spraying of fruit trees during time of blossoming.

Corn is best for an evening feed. It may be given in conjunction with other grain, but in cool weather nothing keeps up a more uniform body heat than corn. The grinding capacity of a hen's stomach is great, and before morning arrives her meal of the previous evening has disappeared, and something to take its place is necessary. Corn lasts longer and produces more heat than any other grain fed to poultry.

Very young pigs are easily stunted by the cold. An hour's exposure on a severely cold day may affect the future of the pig, preventing growth till later on in life. Early spring is the best time for sows to farrow, as the pigs will then have an opportunity to go on the pasture as soon as weaned, and when they get a good start they will be as large at the end of the year as those that are farrowed now.

The new way to grow onions is to sow the seed in hotbeds about six or eight weeks before they are to be transplanted. As onions are the earliest of crops to go into the ground (often in March), the hotbed may be made ready now. In this section onions are grown from sets produced from seed the previous year. By the new method the sets are grown from the seed in the hotbed within a few weeks, instead of losing a year's time for that purpose.—Germantown Telegraph.

If the farmer has not a good clover field that will be ready for the shoats in June, try sowing an acre of peas where you can turn the pigs in to harvest them. Sow a bushel of seed to the acre, in drills, and turn the pigs in as the peas begin to ripen up. Select some sort that grows to medium height; cultivate as long as possible. When they fall down they will not be as liable to mildew as the tall growing sorts that make heavier vine and foliage.

Ex-Governor Hoard, of Wisconsin, says that every cow is born with her certain limit in percentage of butter fat. One cow is born with a 3 per cent limit, another with 4 per cent, another with 5 per cent, and another with 6 per cent. A cow that has an undeveloped limit can be developed by feeding, but the cow that has gone to the extent of her limit can not be made to go a single ounce further. Feed her high and she will grow fat, but will not exceed her limit of butter fat. She will give you fifty pounds of milk per day in June and it will make a pound of butter; she will give you twenty-five pounds of milk in October and it will make a pound of butter. The water has decreased, which increases the percentage of solids but not the absolute amount.

FIVE FAMOUS ETCHINGS.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem river at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of falling waters and spray.

No. 3—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4—"999 and the DeWitt Clinton." The Famous Empire State Express Engine "999" which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "DeWitt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railroad science in the past fifty years.

No. 5—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark St., Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address, postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to Geo. H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

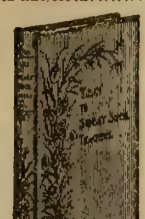
Talks to Sunday School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth..... .75



This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Telescope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

An entirely new large type edition of this inimitable Commentary, in six large 8vo. volumes, fine cloth, $15.00; or, in half Morocco, $18.00:

"Biblical students who are most familiar with the very best commentaries of this generation are most able to appreciate the unfading freshness, the clear analysis, the spiritual force, the quaint humor, and the evangelical richness of Matthew Henry's Exposition of the Old and New Testaments."—New York Observer

"First among the mighty for general usefulness we are bound to mention the man whose name is a household word—MATTHEW HENRY. He is the most pious and pithy, sound and sensible, suggestive and sober, terse and trust worthy."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

The Present Tenses of the Blessed Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer. 32 mo, 50 cents.

"It is sufficient to say its one direct aim is the present enjoyment of the precious promises. Mr. Meyer's earnest and persuasive teaching in this direction is admirably condensed in these brief chapters."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

Christian Living. Cloth, 32 mo, 50 cents

"A more suggestive and helpful volume it would not be easy to name."—Christian Leader.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

CHICAGO.

Negroes want one of their race in the city council, and want him there at the coming spring election.

At Chicago banks there is a better demand for money, and signs that business is improving are on the increase.

The Anchor Insurance Company of London, England, has been doing business in America illegally, particularly near Chicago.

As a result of the endeavors of President H. R. Waite, of New York, a local lodge of American Institute of Civics will be formed.

Inventor of the Ferris wheel is at the head of a company which will exhibit a miniature reproduction of the World's Fair.

Frank H. Harper, said to be a clever forger, swindled two banks out of $6,800 by raised cheeks.

COUNTRY.

Dissatisfied land-owners have brought work on a Florida road to a stop by planting dynamite bombs along the right-of-way.

Encouraging reports of the progress of the movement were made to the National Woman's Suffrage convention in Washington.

Lowest prices ever known were reached during the week in wheat, silver, coke and some forms of iron and steel.

Milwaukee's Plankinton Bank will be re-opened under the national law March 1. It will have a capital of $500,000.

Bank clearings at American cities showed a decrease last week of 37.1 per cent in comparison with last year.

Government ownership of the Nicaragua Canal and annexation of Hawaii were favored by the Trans-Mississippi Congress.

Colorado Populists are planning to establish a co-operative colony in the Ute Indian reservation in that State.

By a mistake Mr. Luke, of Nashville, Ill., was confirmed by the Senate as postmaster at Nashville, Iowa.

Ninety-three per cent of Illinois school children have been vaccinated in accordance with the order of the health board.

Peckham's nomination to the Supreme bench was rejected by the Senate, the vote being 32 for to 41 against.

All but $2,000,000 worth of the new 5 per cent bonds have been paid for and the money covered into the Treasury.

Master builders discussed the uniform contract. Officers were elected and Baltimore selected for the next convention.

To a committee from Dubuque, Governor Jackson, of Iowa, declared himself against the mulct law and in favor of local option.

Archimedes C. Dixon, who figured prominently in the affairs of Illinois at an early day, is dead at Springfield.

Labor chiefs requested Judge Jenkins to modify his order restraining Northern Pacific employes from striking.

Trouble is brewing among the silver diggers in Idaho. In the Cœur d' Alene district, the union miners have declared war upon the Italians employed at the works, and trouble is feared.

Neighbors compelled Carter, the Colma, Mich., messiah, to cease beating his wife. He said she was possessed of a devil.

Ottumwa (Iowa) business men have formed an organization to secure the punishment of alleged corrupt officials.

Editor Bidwell, of the A. P. A. paper at Fort Wayne, Ind., was arrested for criminal libel. He furnished bail.

Work of the Senate Committee on the tariff bill is nearly finished. Few changes have been made.

Friends of Knox College at Galesburg, Ill., celebrated the fifty-seventh anniversary of its founding.

The Burlington Insurance Co., a pioneer in its line in Iowa, has failed. Its liabilities are heavy.

On one particular day last week, wheat reached an unprecedentedly low price in all the markets of the world. Such a phenomenon deserves a passing comment, because it is not likely to occur again for a century, and for the various reasons assigned for its occurrence now.

Patrick Eugene Prendergast, the slayer of Mayor Harrison, has been found guilty of murder and sentenced to be hanged March 23. All pleas of insanity or aberration of mind introduced to secure acquittal or a new trial were promptly overruled by the court, and justice will take its course.

Commenting on a reference in Rev. W. B. Stoddard's recent letter to the Mennonite Brethren in Pennsylvania, the Gospel Banner, of Berlin, Ont., says: "We notice that our brethren in Pennsylvania are getting stirred on this question of secrecy. That is right." And we rejoice.

A note from the pastor of a church at Goldsboro, N. C., makes this interesting statement: "The Cynosure is a good paper, and doing a great and much-needed work. It ought to be in the hands of every Christian minister in the country. Long may it live and flourish. I am a Mason myself, but the harshest treatment I have ever received has been from Masons." Such a testimony is worth more than all the rhodomontade of Masonic orators and writers in praise of their fraternity.

A lady-subscriber at Davis Junction, Ill., writes as follows: "I think you will have to commence a stronger fight on the minor secret societies and their influence on the community, as they are but the stepping-stones to Masonry and kindred orders, and are simply breaking down the wall of opposition to higher orders." Our reform is directed against all these secret orders, big and little; but it is generally understood that Freemasonry is the promoter of minor societies, and encourages their organization, as our correspondent indirectly suggests, to familiarize the unwary and timid with secret rites, thus preparing their members to make an easier entrance into the larger fraternities. Freemasonry, therefore, is the principal order against whom our efforts are to be directed with the most energy.

In connection with the report of a Methodist Episcopal revival at Wheaton, printed on another page, in which the anti-secrecy reform comes to the front, we are informed that lodge-members of the church, rebelling against the manly course of the Methodist pastor, are this week preparing to organize a new Odd-fellows' lodge in Wheaton. This reminds us of that scriptural passage in which Samuel rebukes Saul: "Behold, to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams. For rebellion is as the sin of witchcraft, and stubbornness is as iniquity and idolatry." 1 Sam. 15:22, 23.

An ordinance was recently adopted by the city officials of Abilene, Kan., to compel the farmers of that (Dickinson) county "to assume the payment of a part of the city's indebtedness, which the farmers had no hand in creating and for which they are in no way responsible, by exacting an occupation tax of every farmer who claims the right to sell the products of his farm in a way most satisfactory to himself and the buyer." This brings the Farmers' Alliance of the county into direct conflict with the authorities of Abilene, and the former threaten that if the tax ordinance is not repealed they will pledge themselves to trade in other places and leave Abilene to its fate.

The Cynosure made a misstatement the other day, in saying that the Western Catholic News of February 3 had said that the new Irish League recently formed in this city—the "Ults"—was "intended to embrace every Irishman in the United States," and designed "to rise en masse and demand Ireland for the Irish, or by force and arms go and take it." The words "by force and arms" were not printed in the News, but were inserted on the natural inference and implication that if an army of 500,000 should attempt to invade Ireland for the purpose of "taking" it, the British government would require it to be done "by force and arms," or not at all. With this exception the item was correct.

The Wesleyan Methodist quotes from the Discipline of that church: "We require that all our ministers and members shall favor the use of the Bible in our public schools;" and then rightly says: "Some critics of our most holy religion treat it as one of the sects. It is supreme; our Christ is Lord of lords, and King of kings. Our public schools can hardly teach a common morality without exalting Christ." It should be more generally and better understood that pure and simple Christianity is not sectarian. It is only when the churches, following the lead of the lodges, mix up Christianity with the traditions and errors of men that they become sectarian. This is the great hindrance to a unification of the church of Christ.

Northwestern University, at Evanston, Ill., was stirred last week by the disbanding of one of its Greek-letter secret fraternities—the Tau Kappa Phi, which was organized two years ago for the purpose of securing a charter of Delta Kappa Epsilon. The reason of its disbandment was the failure to obtain the coveted charter, because as a local fraternity it could not compete with the general fraternities which have chapters in the university. At the convention in Minneapolis last fall the charter for the revival of the old Delta Delta chapter of the D. K. E. at Chicago was fatal to the petition from Northwestern, as the general fraternity would not grant two charters in the same city in one year. The local society has refused charters from five fraternities of as high standing in the fraternity world as any now at Northwestern, but the men were for D. K. E. or nothing.

Scottish Rite Masons at Duluth, Minn., last week, following an old French custom, "adopted" two matrons—wives of Masons, the only class of women who are eligible—into the lodge in that city. The custom has not been generally followed in the United States, but may become popular, since it is claimed that all lodges have the power to exercise this rite of adoption. The two matrons so favored have the privilege of selecting a third one, and the third another, if they consider the special services of any Masons' wives in the cause of Freemasonry worthy of such lodge recognition. Of meritorious women upon whom this rite was formerly conferred may be mentioned the Empress Josephine and Mme. De Stael. They are permitted to wear the Masonic apron at all exercises of the order, and to be Masons so far as their sex will allow.

Various expressions of opinion have grown out of the recent decisions of several Federal court judges relating to the rights of men employed by railroad companies. Those of Judges Caldwell and Jenkins have already been given in these columns, and the following is that of Judge Dundy in the same connection and spirit: "Any employe who does not wish to continue under the new condition may terminate, quit at any time and in any manner, so as not to obstruct business, and it is unlawful for employes to conspire or confederate together while in the employ of the receivers with the intention of inducing and causing a strike. They are also ordered to refrain from entering into any combination with the object of interfering with or obstructing the business in the hands of the receivers, and are commanded to desist and refrain from disabling or rendering unfit for use any property in the service." Opposition to these decisions emanates from interested parties who do not believe that railroad corporations have a right to regulate the government of their own affairs, when that right interferes with the malevolence of oath-bound secret and tyrannical organizations.

A METHODIST'S VIEWS OF SECRET SOCIETIES.

The following is a letter written by a member of the Methodist Episcopal church to his pastor, the subject of which may be interesting to the readers of the Cynosure:

EAST BOSTON, Jan. 7, 1894.

Rev. W. I. Haven,

DEAR PASTOR:—The reason why I did not partake of the communion to-day it is quite right that I should explain. For a long while I have not had it administered to me by anyone who practices heathenish rites and ceremonies, or, more explicitly, one who is a member of the Masonic fraternity; and as you had an assistant to aid you to-day who is a member of that unholy institution, is the reason why I absented myself from such a solemn, sacred and divine institution as is the ordinance of the Lord's Supper. Yours in Christian fellowship, STEPHEN GROVER.

In introducing myself to the Cynosure readers I can only say that the subject which is so well understood by its patrons is simply a repetition of events as they may come to each one's experience and observations. I have been a subscriber to the Cynosure for nearly eighteen years; and before this, since about the year 1850, I have contended against secret societies from the fact (as I believe them to be) that they were contrary to the doctrines and principles of Christianity and a republican form of government. But when the Cynosure came to my notice, it gave me a fresh start, and to-day I am more and more indoctrinated into the principles which it so nobly and heroically advocates and sustains.

The letter addressed to Rev. W. I. Haven is as follows:

East Boston, Dec., 1893.

From Stephen Grover to Rev. W. I Haven.

Dear Pastor:—A letter written by myself to you at this time, probably, may not be expected. But a question of considerable importance to myself, as a member of the M. E. church, has for a long time been revolving in my mind, and at times I have endeavored to banish it from my thoughts. Therefore I am writing this, disclosing to you, as pastor, a question, the nature of which involves a serious and careful consideration, the matter of which I will mention in this communication further on. And now, to be as brief as possible, I wish to state in the beginning that I am a man seventy-five years of age, and of a sound mind.

My father and mother were both members of the Methodist E. church, and my remembrance of them in early days, and through life, has been of precious memory.

My father lived to be nearly my own age. My mother passed away in the thirty-ninth year of her age. She was of gentle temperament, and a filial, devoted Christian woman, whose constant devotion to the cause of Christ has had a wonderderful influence over my whole life. I am the oldest of eight children, and they all have passed on before me, and, I hope, to the better land.

My wife was a noble Christian woman, and of positive convictions. She died in 1884, and I live to mourn the loss of a true and faithful companion. She was of a family of thirteen children. Her father and mother were John and Bathsheba S. Hall, of long-line Methodism in the city of Springfield, Mass. They and their children, excepting three now living, are deposited in Springfield cemetery; and so my kindred are passing on, one by one, to the world beyond.

For fifty years I have been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, and from childhood it was my home. For many years I was an admirer of her Christian precepts, her customs, usages and her fraternal Christian fellowship. But now how changed! As we turn to her record as it appears to-day, I am sorry to say that errors of the most serious and flagrant aspect have been creeping into her borders; (her garments are defiled); they are of a character so insidious, and still so apparent, that no one needs to be mistaken as to the effect which they are producing. Errors which are entirely antagonistic to the advancement and development of Christian piety and purity, and the peace, harmony and unity which ought to possess it to-day, to make it a successful, permanent, spiritual church, seem to have lost their power and identity, and it is subverting itself to the customs and usages of the world in so many ways that it has become disloyal to the doctrines which it once so tenaciously advocated and adhered to.

One of the principal features noticeable, which has caused this direful change in the M. E. church, unquestionably, is the assimilating itself with the works of darkness or the creeping into it of secret societies, from Freemasonry (so-called), on through every grade of a kindred nature. But some would say: Prove your assertions before making a charge. Well, that would be quite necessary and an important consideration in point of law. So that in making a charge of anything detrimental to the character of whatever its nature may be, is to prove that the charges are made against the character. As an instance, take that of the institution of Freemasonry, which has been so proven that not a doubt needs to exist in the mind of anyone who has read the verdict which has been passed or pronounced upon it by competent judges. I have read and heard the testimonies of so many witnesses who have been there and left the order that I have no reason to change my mind as to its character from what I have learned in all the years past of my experience and observations. And, again, the arguments of Freemasonry are sufficient of themselves to convince anyone as to something of its nature and design. As such, they are denials, threats, calumny and abuse. And then, again, their rites and ceremonies are borrowed from paganism. They are ridiculous and nonsensical. Their oaths, obligations and penalties are blasphemous and illegal, and are too barbarous to be tolerated by any Christian or civilized people; and as such they should be abandoned by every intelligent being. Every American who is a patriot and a lover of his country, and especially every Christian, should investigate these claims.

Wesley said of American slavery that it was the sum of all villainies; and yet it was said to be a divine institution. And so would we say of Freemasonry, that this, too, is the sum of all villainies, and is called a divine institution. In 1844, the Methodist church divided on the question of slavery, and the compact was considered so sacred that the church North would not permit a Southern minister to preach in their pulpits. But since that time Freemasonry has reconciled those differences, the same as the church and the world are reconciled or have compromised. Although God's judgments are slow, yet they are sure to come. Are not the elements already in motion soon to bring on another disruption of a kind of which we little think? Freemasonry is anti-Christian in character, by its very nature, as well as Odd-fellowship, Knights of Pythias, and the whole catalogue of secret societies; and these, being proven to be anti-Christian, should it not be the right and duty of the church of God, according to the nature and intent of its discipline, to examine and try every member who belongs to and holds on to his lodge relations; to forbid him membership in the church, as it does in some churches and should be in all, unless he forsakes and gives up, as he should any other evil, his allegiance to every secret order to which he may belong? But some have become so blinded to the truth and apostatized, is it any wonder that God should send them strong delusions, that they might believe a lie? Can anyone who belongs to such an institution, especially a professor of religion, remain there, and be consistent with his obligations as a Christian, without compromising with the evil? Read 2 Corinthians, 6th chapter, from the 14th, and through with 17th and 18th verses, and many other passages in the Bible in which it gives light on this subject. Are not these appeals to Christians convincing proofs and evidences of these abominations?

Yet we have become so accustomed to liberal views that the church itself does not make it very difficult for an unregenerate man to accept the conditions as they are held out to him, they being so favorable while in his natural state, that he gives his consent, is received, and his name goes on record as a probationer. To my mind this is confusion, and indicates conditions unfavorable and objectionable to that which the Gospel requires. Is there not more effort being made to-day to get people into the churches on easy terms, so as to add members to their rolls, than to press upon them the importance of vital and practical Christianity? And in the absence of this, is it any wonder that sinners are sleeping in their security?

A department of work now going on in our midst under the auspices of the National Christian and Christian Workers' Association (of which you are undoubtedly mindful), are doing a work for God, for country and home that ought to engage the attention of every thoughtful man and woman in the whole universe of our being; and the fact that Christians of different denominations have come to the rescue and made themselves active and interested in this work, is a cause for congratulation and rejoicing; and by the help of friends they are doing all they can to further the cause of the kingdom of Christ in all parts of the world, so far as they have been able to do so by the means which are constantly being contributed for the maintenance of this object.

Their labors embrace every department of Christian work, preaching and presenting the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, as it is unfolded to them in the Gospel of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. This they are doing without the fear of man, or anything that men may say or do. When I consider how the Methodist Episcopal Church everywhere as a body is harboring these questionable institutions, so infidel in their character, it almost paralyzes my understanding. Christianity and Freemasonry ever can mix no more than oil and water; and here I am—a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church which countenances such inconsistencies. Yes, very truly it has a name, but the high places which have stained her former goodly reputation are not taken away.

For a long while I have had this subject so many times brought to my mind, that on account of the objections given in the statements before mentioned, is the reason why I wish to call your attention to the object of my writing, and to you as pastor brings me necessarily to your notice.

I claim that the M. E. Church is highly chargeable and responsible for these conditions, and so long as I remain a member of it, I must necessarily, as an individual, acquiesce and endorse the charges brought against her; and on this account, and for these reasons, I appeal to you, as pastor of the Saratoga Street M. E. Church, to have my name withdrawn from its records; and from the date this is received, and action taken upon it, I shall no longer consider myself a member of the M. E. Church.

I take this course not without a struggle, and a severe one, too; and yet more explicitly from a sense of duty which I owe to myself and my convictions. My action in this matter has been taken without consultation or advice from anyone. My allegiance is to God, and not to man.

My views on the subject of secret societies are also the same as those of many excellent men and women of literary attainments and noble Christian characters, and are the opinions, too, of many eminent men who have held high positions in the history of our country.

Although the labors of these men and women at the present time are attended with much difficulty, sacrifice and opposition, and a seeming indifference on the part of the public and Christian people to comprehend these important questions, still we have reason to believe that many are beginning to investigate this subject, learning more and more about it, and coming into the light and embracing the truth, for the truth's sake.

As the subject of temperance does not escape my attention, I will, in the first place say in regard to it, that I noticed the largest part of professing Christians cast their ballots, at the late State elections, squarely for the rum parties, for the extension and strengthening of the liquor license; and then, seeing the enthusiasm they manifested for local option, it would seem as if their partisan notions and proclivities obscured every other idea of right and wrong. Thus, by holding on to their party, they defeated the very object for making prohibition feasible.

Esau lost his birthright that he might gain a mess of pottage. Lot risked the ruin of his family that he might pasture his flocks in the rich plains of Sodom. Men will sacrifice their convictions on the whisky traffic to vote their convictions on the tariff. They will risk the defilement of their sons and daughters, rather than give up their party prejudices and lessen the evil. Within the past thirty years what advancement has there been made for the cause of temperance in improving its condition? Yes; we have talked about it, and prayed over it; but we go to the polls and vote for the saloon. Strange consistency!

Some of these partisans at this election arrogated to themselves such wonderful, mystical, illuminated, comprehensive ideas of the situation as was marvelous in the extreme. But there were 8,000 who stood their ground against the marshaling host of those who voted for State license. But the time is coming when we may see the hand of the Almighty laid heavily upon us as it was in generations and ages past, when his people departed from him and went into all kinds of idolatry and iniquity; and is he not here already admonishing us with a threatening aspect? Should there not be written on the walls of churches who are guilty of these charges, these words: "Drunkenness, Debauchery, Vice, Devastation, Poverty, Wretchedness, Crime, Disease and Death?" And this the Christian people voted for, to give the State the right to license to do this very thing, and bring on the church a judgment for being accessory to this evil; and unless God's people shake off their transgressions and give up their idolatrous, iniquitous practices, and come out fully on the Lord's side, we may have reason to fear that terrible results will follow; as at the battle in Mount Gilboa, when the Philistines routed and defeated the Israelite and the beauty of Israel was slain in her high places, and the mighty were fallen. Tell it not in Gath, publish it not in the streets of Askelon, lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised triumph; and still with all the admonitions which have come down to us from ages past, history is repeating itself in our day.

Perhaps I have written more than I need to, to cover the ground of my object. I could add much more, but will close with a few more words.

The step which I have concluded to take has been a thoughtful one of long-time standing, and one of which I am aware that in doing so I leave behind me, as a member of the church, true and valued friends whom I regard and esteem. Not but that I shall meet them as heretofore in the assembly of private and public worship, as the Lord leads or directs.

In considering this my position, I would say that I have prayed over it many times, that the Lord would mould and guide me into all truth and decide the matter, and to give me an understanding heart; and as this question has so long a time been constantly reminding me, I can see no other way out. Thus my duty is plain and decided. Therefore you will, as pastor of the Saratoga Street M. E. church, please carry out my request as before-mentioned, and erase my name from the records of the Methodist Episcopal Church; and for this, and for all I may have to say or do, I shall meet you to answer at the judgment before Him who doeth all things well.

Now, in conclusion, I would add to all this: May you, dear pastor and brother in Christ, myself, and all others who love our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth, so work and labor in his service, according to the various vocations and positions wherewith we are called, as will best serve the kingdom of Christ on the earth, and by so doing so fulfill the great object of our lives that the prospect of a home in heaven will be so bright that the present one will be but the beginning of that more glorious and eternal one to which we are hastening.

With love to all in Christ's name, I subscribe myself, yours truly, STEPHEN GROVER.

P. S. If there is anything which I have mentioned in these statements that would seem to be uncharitable or unjust, and not in harmony with the truth, I would be glad to be informed by any member who should be so disposed. But this has not been my intention, I having taken great care not to do so, only stating the considerations and convictive views as I have been led to utter them. S. G.

THESE FROM CHINA.

"And these shall come from the land of (Sinim) China." —Isaiah 49: 12.

The Chinese Mission, in the National Christian Association building at 221 West Madison street, was organized in November, 1885 It is now (and has been) the only place in Chicago rented and used solely for the purpose of missionary work among this people. The rooms have been kept open by the superintendent for the purposes of instruction, advice or assistance, and to welcome strangers, especially Christians.

A school is held every Sunday evening during the entire year, this being their one entirely disengaged evening. This is the only Sunday evening school, although several Sunday afternoon schools are conducted in different churches. During the winter, Monday afternoon and evening schools are held in this mission. At 6:30 o'clock Sunday evenings, a prayer meeting is conducted by our Chinese converts in their own language. Exhortations, reading portions of the Bible, with explanations, singing our Gospel hymns, and prayers occupy an hour.

In the eight years of the life of this mission, from among its regular attendants, there have been forty-eight conversions. Some have been baptized in different Presbyterian and Baptist churches; some in the First Congregational church. Four of this number are now evangelists in their own land, and we receive the most encouraging reports of their faithful labors, their consistent lives, and their endurance under persecution. Others are preparing for the same work; in fact, 12½ per cent of the whole number of converts are giving their lives to labor for Christ. Four of our number have been called to their heavenly home, all, without a single exception, testifying in a most striking manner to their trust in Christ, in sickness as well as in the dying hour. I will mention one in particular: Lee Lung, a bright, winning youth, who loved nothing so well as the mission and the hours spent there. He died, after a brief illness, in a small hotel on South Clark street. His constant prayer was: "Our Father, thou knowest we can do nothing good unless thou help us. Please take me up to that beautiful home."

The American inmates of the hotel and the proprietor were all much affected, the latter saying to some faithful teachers who were tenderly nursing our dear pupil: "I have been a professing Christian; am now a backslider, but I cannot stand that Chinese boy's prayers."

During eight years, 18,000 individual Bible lessons have been given to hundreds of Chinese. Can anything but the last day disclose the amount of good done by this seed-sowing under the divine blessing?

As our pupils leave us, we follow them with letters to teachers in other places, and thus, having once gained them, endeavor to keep them under religious influences. Through these converts families are reached in China. Through the instrumentality of one, nearly his entire family have been brought to Christ—father, mother, brother, sister and others. In this instance, the younger of three brothers, all in Chicago at that time, became a Christian. An older brother, thinking him false to parents and their religion, undertook to chastise him, and came near inflicting serious injury. He went, in his wounded condition, to his teacher, who endeavored to soothe both body and mind. At first he was very indignant, but in a few moments said: "No; I will never hurt him; he is my mother's boy." Not long after this, the older brother sickened, and the younger cared for him for weeks. As the older brother afterwards expressed it: "I watched—to see if he did anything wrong, and I found he did not, and I thought I would like to be a Christian myself." So, by the consistent life and forbearance of this young convert, this brother was brought to Christ, and is now not only an earnest, faithful follower of the Saviour, but also an evangelist. Shortly after this evangelist's return to China, his father died; and because he refused to take part in a feast to the father's spirit, he was shot at, but not injured. The mark of the bullet is still to be seen in the home. Incidents like these could be multiplied.

God has wonderfully blessed this mission in giving us faithful teachers, and he alone can reward them for all their self denial; and not until they reach that happy land, will they know how many were saved through their loving Christian efforts. We have been greatly encouraged, too, by the presence and earnest assistance of a number of the students of the McCormick Seminary.

Our school numbers about thirty, although the average attendance is not so great. Some of our pupils come many miles for instruction. We have had one regular pupil from Elgin, who is now a professing Christian.

There are in our city about 2,000 Chinese, a large proportion of whom never heard the name of Christ. Hundreds have returned to China, to whom has never been offered the "Bread of Life" by anyone of Christ's followers. Does not a tremendous responsibility rest on God's people in regard to those for whom Christ has also died?

In Isaiah we find the prophecy, "Behold! these shall come from far, and lo! these from the north and from the west, and these from the land of Sinim." It is acknowledged by all who have made the subject a study, that Sinim means China. Is not this prophecy being fulfilled? They have come, and shall they return unbenefited by us? May God, in his mercy, arouse us to a deep sense of our responsibility to him and to our fellow-men, and enable us to do all in our power for them while the opportunity lasts. If the Chinese in this country were reached by earnest, Christian effort, what a grand army might be sent back, carrying the blessed light of God's Word to lighten the dark places of that wonderful land.

Dear Christian friends, may God give us all a burning desire to give the "Bread of Life" to others as freely as we ourselves have received.

Should anyone feel a desire to know more of this work, they can address Mrs. C. O. Waters, Superintendent Chinese Mission, 221 West Madison St., Chicago, Ill.

BARNACLES.

BY B K HALSMAN.

What are barnacles? By the time you have read this you will know. Barnacles are a species of small shellfish that cause sailors much trouble by fastening themselves to the bottom of vessels and growing and multiplying very rapidly, and often retarding the ship in its progress, making it difficult to gain headway. Some time ago a preparation was produced that was guaranteed to prevent the barnacles from getting a hold on the vessel; to prove which, a vessel was painted, one-half of it with ordinary paint, the other half with the new product. The result was that in a short while one-half of the boat was full of barnacles, and the other half perfectly free from them. The consequence was that it required all the skill of the man at the wheel to keep the boat on its course. It persisted in going in a circle.

There are plenty of Christians full of barnacles, such as secret societies, for instance. As in the case of the vessel, the barnacles of secret societies are stronger than the Christian profession, and they whirl around seven nights in the week, going out of the straight course which they should pursue—class and prayer-meetings, and visiting the sick.

Get a good application of the precious blood on the bottom of your vessel (heart) and all the objectionable barnacles in the shape of lodges, church festivals, entertainments, life insuring, oyster suppers, pink teas, mum parties, charity balls, progressive euchre parties, tobacco using, Sunday car-riding, patronizing the bread and milk man on Sundays, and all other things that are really hindrances to your progress, will have no hold on you, and eventually you will have ministered unto you an abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of your Father.

SPIRITUALISM IN HIGH PLACES.

Although to us this system is of recent origin, yet the necromancy, divination and witchcraft, forbidden in the Old Testament and practiced by the heathen of those times, were all of a similar character. So in the apostles' days there were those possessed with the spirit of divination, and by sorcery, enchantment, etc., performed wonders or miracles either real or pretended. (See Acts 8:9–11, and Acts 16: 16–18) Because of these practices the nations were driven out of Canaan from before the children of Israel. And with the miracles to be wrought the frog-like spirits are to "go forth unto the kings of the earth and of the whole world to gather them to the battle of that great day of God Almighty." (Rev. 6: 14.)

The following extract was published by the Harbinger of Light, of Australia, and credited to a journal called El Deluvio. We look upon its statements as fulfilling in a marked manner the passage before quoted. It is not the first time in recent years that the rulers of Europe have been laid under such a charge:

"In Russia all of the court is affected by spiritualism. The imperial family frequently gives itself up to the experiments of mediums. The Czar declares himself completely convinced. In court circles table-turning is resorted to, and spirits are questioned by a great variety of methods. It is an open secret that the Czar himself and the grand dukes submit themselves to the counsels and directions of the spirits in serious political emergencies. It further appears that the Czar is favored with frequent and characteristic communications, the elevated character of which has arrested his serious attention and inspired him with a great interest in the subject.

"During the reign of the Emperor William in Germany, he was much occupied with spiritualism both in Potsdam and Berlin. It will be remembered that the Emperor believed himself to be in continual communication with the tutelary genii of the German nation. During the short reign of the Emperor Frederick, spiritualism still continued to be much in vogue.

"Queen Victoria, who has preserved a species of worship for the memory of the Prince Consort, has been for some time engaged is collecting into a volume the communications which she professes to have received from her deceased husband. She always consults him when great political questions are at stake, and pretends that his advice is of inestimable value.

"For the rest, the whole of the English aristocracy is manifestly inclined toward psychical investigations; and to cite one prominent example, it is well known that Lord Lytton, the British Ambassador in Paris, who died recently, was a confirmed spiritualist."—Messiah's Herald.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Minot's Ledge.—Rev. I. J. Lansing on hard times.—The latest thing in lodgedom.—Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer on secret college fraternities.—Fast Day.

The papers cheerfully inform us that New England "got only the tail-end" of the recent blizzard. What must it have been in localities where the unfortunate inhabitants got the head and front? But it was terrible on the coast, and gave to dwellers near Minot's Ledge lighthouse a rare sight; for the waves ran so high as to break completely over this famous structure, making it look, when the sun shone out, like a dazzling pillar of ice. I remember thinking, in my far-away childhood, that it must be the heighth of felicity to live in a lighthouse; and even now I can imagine a charm in it under certain aspects:—of softly dimpling waves, purple sunrises, sunsets that make the ocean like the "sea of glass mingled with fire," and holy moonlights that convert it to a pavement of shining silver, bright and pure enough for the path to Paradise of a translated saint;—but in equinoctial gales and winter storms, when the tall tower quivers in every part to the thunder of the billows breaking over it, the inmates must sometimes think, with a shiver, of that tempest away back in the early fifties, which wrecked the first building, snapping its massive iron girders like pipe-stems.

"I am sick of hearing labor-unions that get drunk say that capital oppresses them; I am sick of hearing politicians talk about the hard times as being due to the tariff and that only." So said Rev. I. J. Lansing at the Park Street church, the other evening, in the first of his series of Sunday-evening sermons on "Hard Times and their Causes." It is a good sign that ministers are beginning to turn their attention to these economic problems, for though "the life is more than meat," our religious and social well-being are very closely interlinked. The only wonder is that with $500,000,000 leaking out annually through the liquor traffic, and other sums that aggregate even more spilling out of a multitude of smaller holes in the nation's purse, that the times are not worse. But dark hours have their lessons. A most important one, it seems to me, is to train children to turn their hands to different kinds of labor. The best form charity can take is to give work to the unemployed; but it is often hampered by this want of faculty in the employes. One of our Boston charities has lately given the men rags to sew, which are afterwards made into rugs, and at first they were an amusingly "awkward squad" with the new implement. But if every mother would teach her boy to wield the needle, and every father teach his girl to use a hammer, there would be less inconvenience when necessity obliges the sexes to change employments. A woman's cheap restaurant has lately been opened, where a good and substantial meal can be bought for five cents. A similar one for the men has been in operation some time, but this new philanthropic venture has not been equally well-patronized for reasons difficult to tell. Perhaps a false pride in many cases keeps away those who need it most. It may be stated in this connection, that the usual banquet of the New England Chautauqua Association is to be omitted this year on account of the hard times. Many unthinking people still cling to the idea that extravagant outlays in the way of parties, banquets, and fine dresses put money in circulation, and thus help the poor. A greater fallacy never existed.

The last thing in lodgedom (to my knowledge) is a kind of tramp union, which, true to those beautifully restrictive principles that limit the charity of the F. & A. M., I. O. O. F. and other similar organizations, helps only its own members, who, moreover, have to be regular Boston tramps for a certain period before they can be initiated and receive the grip and password. Their brethren in Lowell, thus frozen out, are reported to be quite indignant thereat. Now what next? The controversy in the Masonic fraternity in Norwalk, Conn., over the support of a poor member of the order, which the local lodge wishes to avoid paying, still continues, and makes a bad showing to outside cowans. I see by a number of the Arrow, the organ of the Phi Beta fraternity, that Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer has put herself on record as opposed to these societies. It was at a meeting of the Collegiate Alumni, and her views, as given in the abstract, were that the day for such organizations is gone by; that while there might have possibly existed a need for these fraternities in the past, these trivial things, which seem only child's play, and not at all suitable for men and women eager to gain all that life holds dear, should, in accordance with the democratic idea, give way to clubs of history, psychology and the like. Such words from a woman who stands in the front rank of educators ought to have no little influence.

President Eliot of Harvard, in his annual report just issued, deals a sweeping but deserved blow at the whole system of inter-collegiate contests, giving it as his opinion that no student can keep up his studies and give the time and strength to athletic exercises which they necessarily demand, and that it tends, as now conducted, towards the brutal and the vulgar, being demoralizing alike to students and spectators. The papers give whole columns of "their valuable space" to discussions of this important subject, which I am sure they would not be willing to give if it pertained to the purely literary work of the college. "A clock that does not go is right once in twenty-four hours," says George Eliot; and even the president of Harvard College occasionally takes the right position.

Mrs. Amelia A. Frost, who was recently ordained to the Congregational ministry in Littleton, Mass., is said to be the first woman ordained as a preacher by that body in Massachusetts. The way in which she was led to take up the work of the ministry reminds one of Saxe Holme's beautiful story, "Droxy Miller," and the necessity laid upon the elder's wife to minister to the unshepherded flock herself. A failure in her husband's health first led Mrs. Frost to study for the ministry and then to aid her invalid husband by preaching for him, sometimes his sermons, sometimes her own. So satisfactory was the arrangement that she received a unanimous call from the society to be their associate-pastor. Now that the percentage of young men who are fitting themselves for the ministry is so small, perhaps the balance can be restored by a larger number of consecrated women choosing the sacred profession for their life work.

Hartford Theological Seminary has been sued by the city for $4,000 back taxes. While the seminary buildings are exempt by law, the corporation has acquired considerable real estate, including a hotel and several stores, which pay rent to the seminary. It is becoming an important question how far such institutions may hold property as a mere business speculation, and unconnected with the legitimate work, untaxed. The outcome of this test-case will be watched with peculiar interest.

The Fast Day issue is not quite settled—beyond the fact that the day itself is virtually abolished. But what new holiday shall be fixed upon to take its place? The substitute bill, by which the first Thursday in April should be thus set apart and called Puritans' Day, a portion of it in all the public schools of Massachusetts being devoted to exercises relating to the history, purposes or principles of those who settled the commonwealth, was by no means a bad idea. It is much better than to celebrate the 19th, thus running some risk of fostering the war-spirit and ministering to national vainglory. For this latter purpose the Fourth of July is quite sufficient. But Rome, I fear, is much too powerful in our legislature to allow us a Puritan's Day. It would be worse for her than the old-fashioned Fast Day, which she has had so active a hand in abolishing.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, Feb. 21, 1894.

The second week of the Moody and Sankey meetings closed last night with an audience as large as Convention Hall could accommodate. Public interest in the meetings is increasing, instead of diminishing, as one might have supposed would have been the case after holding two meetings a day for two weeks, with the exception of Saturdays. Our ministers have many of them testified to the great good that has already been accomplished, and much more is expected and prayed for. There is only one trouble about such mammoth audiences as are attending these meetings. A very large proportion of the people—probably more than half of them—find it impossible to hear the words spoken from the platform. Let me give you some idea of how big this hall is. It is an entire city square in length, and the entire floor-space is taken up with folding chairs, seating in round numbers 6,000 people. The speaker's platform is two-fifths of the entire length from one end of the hall, being at the bottom of the elevated tiers of seats occupied by the 1,500 members of the choir. The other three-fifths is occupied by rows of folding chairs, with spacious aisles between, and at the extreme end is a small gallery seating several hundred people, which is always filled. This arrangement places the speaker almost in the center of his hearers, and the acoustic properties of the hall are excellent, while the order maintained is phenomenal when the size of the audiences is considered; but no man has a voice of sufficient compass to reach so many people clearly, even during a ten-minute talk, and Mr. Moody often talks much longer. The result is that many of those who go are unable to hear connectedly. It is positively painful to see how Mr. Sankey strains himself in his effort to make his singing heard by all.

Hon. Luther Benson, of Indiana, who is regarded by many as the wearer of the mantle of the late John B. Gough, delivered one of the most graphic temperance addresses ever heard here, Sunday afternoon, under the auspices of the W. C. T. U. It would be difficult to imagine a more horribly realistic bit of word-painting than his description of his own sufferings from delirium tremens in the days when he was a victim of intemperance. Mr. Benson is a thorough believer in the doctrine of "no compromise" in dealing with the alcoholic evil. While here he accepted an invitation to deliver an address at the services to be held in Washington on March 22, in honor of the venerable General Neal Dow, of Maine, who is now in his ninetieth year.

Senator Peffer delivered an address on mutual interdependence, Sunday night, at Foundry church, the foundation of which was the golden rule.

The Treasury Department yesterday began forwarding the new bonds to those who subscribed for them, taking the $1,000 denomination first.

Rev. Dr. Sunderland, the President's pastor, christened little Esther Cleveland, last Sunday afternoon, in the Blue Room at the White House. It was in the same room that President and Mrs. Cleveland were married.

Owing to the inability of the sub-committee to agree, the tariff has not been reported to the Senate Finance Committee, and Senators are apparently very much in doubt as to when it will be reported. The House finds itself utterly unable to do business on account of the opposition to Mr. Bland's bill for the coinage of the seigniorage and the absence of a considerable number of members. A caucus of the majority has declared that the bill shall be kept before the House until disposed of, but its opponents, by refusing to vote, and thus breaking a quorum, have prevented action. This has now been going on a whole week. Extraordinary efforts are being made to get the absent members back to Washington so that those who favor the bill can muster a quorum of their own.

There are two notable things, aside from politics, in connection with the nomination and confirmation of Senator White, of Louisiana, to the vacancy in the U. S. Supreme Court, the previous nominations to which caused long and more or less bitter contests in the Senate, resulting in the rejection of two nominations—Messrs. Hornblower and Peckham, of New York. Justice White is the first man who ever stepped from the U. S. Senate to the bench of the Supreme Court, and the second member of the Roman Catholic church to sit in that court, the first having been Chief Justice Taney, whose "Dred Scott" decision is a part of the history of the United States well remembered by many persons still living. There was no opposition to Justice White, his nomination being confirmed without even the formality of being referred to the Judiciary Committee. His intimacy with the Code Napoleon, which bears upon many cases originating in the States included in the Louisiana purchase, and of the spirit of the Latin civil law, are said to have been the cause of his nomination.

—Joan of Arc has recently been "beatified" (canonized), and the editor of the Catholic Review thus offers her his adoration: "Blessed Maid of Domremy, pray for us!" But will she?

REFORM NEWS.

NOTES FROM NEW HAMPSHIRE.

NEWMARKET, N. H., Feb. 21, 1894.

There are many tokens that the Lord is working among his people by his blessed Holy Spirit. I recently conversed with a neighboring city pastor who has just been loosed from the satanic bonds of Masonry and Odd-fellowship. They seemed to fall off, of their own account, like Peter's chains. This minister was in a preachers' consecration meeting. The moment he gave himself wholly to the Lord, and consented to do whatever might be required, the Lord said to him as distinctly as with spoken voice: "LEAVE THE LODGE." The Lord did not give him the reasons for this until afterwards. But, like Abraham, he obeyed. He immediately withdrew from all his lodges and publicly set himself right in his pulpit. I asked him how it was possible for ministers to belong to such lodges and not see their sinfulness. He said: "They do see it, but they are not willing to do what they know is right. This," said he, "is the reason why lodge ministers are so sensitive to criticism on that subject." I believe this brother is correct, and hence, lodge preachers are more likely to be brought to repentance by stern rebuke than by multiplied arguments. The Holy Spirit did not argue with this man, but told him to do what he had always known he ought to do.

Here is an item that ought to encourage every Gospel laborer: A gentleman sent me his subscription for the Christian Cynosure and the Christian Witness, being a new subscriber for both. I asked him how he had heard of the anti-secret work. He said that some one gave him a copy of the Cynosure. This good man had been deacon of a church for many years, and only needed that some one should introduce him to his friends. Fellow-laborers, let us cast the bread on the waters. The promise is not that it shall return to-day or to-morrow, but after many days. Blessed Deacon Leadbetter, years ago, threw a torch of truth into the neighboring town of Wellesley, and the honest Flaggs caught it up and have been waving it ever since, so that its rays have not only overspread Massachusetts and New England, but have cast its gleam over the whole country and even penetrated foreign lands. Let us speak and write when occasion offers, but be sure not to forget the mighty agency of books, pamphlets, tracts and papers in this glorious warfare for Christ and his church against the false worship and selfishness of the secret lodge system. The battle is won; the only question is whether each of us shall share the glory of the triumph.

FROM THE PACIFIC COAST AGENT.

PHILOMATH, Ore., Feb. 19, 1894.

For some time I have been engaged in revival work on my field. We have not been neglectful of the reform work, but speak, pray and write in its favor. It is remarkable how much can be done by private solicitations to create interest in the cause. Of late, I never go out on the train, or in any company, without doing something to create interest in our work.

Our business manager, Rev. W. I. Phillips, made us a brief visit on the 21st of February. We were pleased to meet him and hear words of encouragement from him.

On Monday night, January 29, we were entertained at the M. E. church in this city by ex-Rev. Mr. Homer, who spoke in favor of the lodges, especially recommending the A. O. U. W. and Odd-fellows, of which he claimed to be a member. His arguments were after the old stereotyped, threadbare sort.

Among his very extravagant statements was this: That "the A. O. U. W. is doing more for suffering humanity than any organization in the world, the church not excepted."

On Monday evening, the 5th, it was our privilege to reply to him in the presence of a large congregation. Among other points we made the following: "The A. O. U. W. and like secret societies are doing nothing for suffering humanity, for the sole reason that suffering humanity is on a level far below these orders. That is not suffering humanity who can support themselves and families, and still have from ten to twenty-five dollars left for initiation and about twenty-two dollars a year for dues. Suffering humanity never gets up to that level, unless it be that humanity which is suffering for advantage over the uninitiated."

The Philomath correspondent for the Corvallis Times said that week: "Rev. P. B. Williams delivered a lecture on Monday night at Keezel chapel, on the subject of secret societies. His galling arraignment of these orders held his audience spellbound for an hour. Among other things he charged that Freemasonry and Odd-fellowship exclude Jesus Christ from their worship. If this charge be true then these orders are Christless institutions. The lecture has been the one topic of discussion during the week."

The lecture was well-attended. Lodgemen were out in full force. Of course they tried to counteract the influence of the address, by denying some things. They made a poor "out" at it.

Rev. H. L. Barkley, presiding elder of Salem district, was present and not only gave his sanction to our address and work, but kindly challenged the lodgemen to meet and publicly discuss the question before any audience on the coast. The Odd-fellows of this place agree to furnish a man. We anxiously await his coming, and regard it the opportunity of a life-time to furnish a man to meet him. It is certain that lodgemen here are ill at ease.

On Friday night, the 9th inst, we spoke at Shedd's, on the Southern Pacific railroad, where there is a Masonic lodge in full blast. A prominent minister who puts in much of his time lecturing and debating, visited this place, not long since, and tried to bolster up the lodges by exalting them above the church, as they all do.

Hearing of his visit and lecture I addressed a letter to "any trustee of the U. P. church, Shedd's, Ore.," asking for a house and audience to show up the other side. After much delay, I received a letter, saying: "If you will address Rev. S. L. L., of this place, he will answer you." I immediately addressed the gentleman, stating the situation. He replied: "I am in no controversy with secret orders; but if you will write to Mr. S., I think you can get the U. P. church."

I immediately replied, thanking him, and adding that "if you are in controversy with anything, or should be in the future, I have two excellent new churches on my charge which you are welcome to enter and present your views." I

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM REV. WILLIAM FENTON.

ST. PAUL, Minn., Feb. 20, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—In the year 1882 I accepted an invitation to preach in one of the Methodist churches of this city. Having noticed that the pastors either worshiped the Masonic abomination or observed criminal silence in regard to it, I followed the text I had chosen in its application to Freemasonry. At the close of the service a Methodist minister said to the congregation that he would preach on the next Sabbath-day, and that he would preach neither Masonry nor Anti-masonry. He was a stranger to me. I found, however, that he was a Freemason; and he lied to me to defend Masonry. Probably he had some Jesuitical evasion in his own mind to excuse his lie. Many years afterward we met on the street, when he grasped my hand and thanked me for my dealing with Masonry, stating that he saw it to be a wicked abomination and had, therefore, abandoned it.

Lately, I sought an interview with the minister who is now the pastor of that church. He informed me that he is a Freemason, and a believer in Freemasonry, and that he had attended the lodge on the evening next previous to my visit, at which time four men were added to their number to join the lodge. He advised me to let Masonry alone and preach the Gospel; but I insisted that the prophets and apostles preached against the religion of the lodge, and that if we would be faithful we must preach as they did. He then made the following challenge: That he would yield to my position, provided I could give him satisfactory evidence of having turned one person from Masonry—"only just one," he said, would be sufficient. The case of the conversion of the minister that I have just now related occurred to me, and I related it to him. But he promptly evaded the issue by saying that he did not know that minister, and he could not verify my statement because that minister was not there in the city. Now his church is infested with lodgery, so that it seems to be run more in the interests of the lodge than the truth.

The other evening at the close of a prayer-meeting in a Baptist church now struggling for its existence, a few of the most active members gathered around me and contended that the lodges to which they belonged were doing more good than the churches!

When will the Lord come? Oh, for a breath of righteousness to go through the churches and gather out God's people!

A public reading-room, where Christian periodicals could be read, is greatly needed in this large city. The Y. M. C. A. is practically out of existence, and good men need not mourn its decease, for it had, at the last, a pugilistic school, with a room especially fitted up for boxing, and its secretary is a Freemason. The Salvation Army was almost extinct, but they have started a training home and are now having a large attendance at their meetings.

The Loyal American, devoted to opposition to Romanism, is making it rather warm for Roman Catholics, showing the people what the beast has done in the past for the nations and what she means to do again if she can. But surely God remembers her. Rev. 18: 5.

ANTI-MASONS HAVE THE RIGHT OF FREE SPEECH.

DE KALB, Iowa, Feb. 7, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—Many lodgemen seem to think that anti-secrecy people are their personal enemies, and show, by their angry looks and words, that they oppose, in a wrong spirit, free speech in an outsider, in regard to things done in darkness. Christianity is at war with wrong principles; and men should not get in the way by having principles that need the cover of secrecy; then they will not take it as a personal insult for others to speak, even if they see differently. Lodgemen say what they please, and exercise all the privileges they like in boasting of their institution, and the orders are exalted above the church. Why should Christians be accounted enemies if they exalt the church of Christ above the lodge? Why is it that anti-secrecy people may not exercise the right of free speech without being counted enemies? Have lodgemen the only right to express opinion in regard to secretism? Why is it that the minister, as a soldier of Jesus Christ, must use blank cartridges only against what he believes to be the enemy of God and man? The minister may teach general principles and exhort people to be saved from all sin; but if it is his honest conviction that the lodge is a wicked institution, he must not say so or try to prove it. For him to quote the Scripture to "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness," and use it in a way that God might direct it, must not be done, because "offences will come," and the preacher be counted an enemy. Many ministers, because of the "offence of the cross," "handle the Word of God deceitfully" on the secrecy question, and Scriptures condemning the iniquity of the lodge are used by them as blank cartridges only.

May we trust in God and have more confidence in Christ, who has all power, and not be influenced by worldly institutions; then the whole church will be more loyal to Christ than now; and the more loyal the church and ministry are, the more divine power they will have in winning souls from darkness to light, from sin to salvation, from the ranks of Satan to the victorious army of God. "Who is on the Lord's side" may show it by the cross of duty, and it is not duty to ignore any subject; for the Lord says: "prove all things," (that we may) "hold fast to that which is good." "Has the offence of the cross ceased?"

CYRUS SMITH.

A LETTER FROM R. N. COUNTEE.

LAWRENCE, Kan., Feb. 17, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—It has been nearly a year since I have allowed the friends and readers of the Cynosure to hear from me through your columns. I have been wandering up and down through the earth, and more especially that part of it known as the "Cowboy State" (Texas).

I have not failed to speak out and be heard concerning the great iniquity that has been, and is yet, throttling the spiritual interest and development of my people. Before I proceed any further I must acquaint you with my present place of abode. I am now a citizen of the great State of Kansas. I moved here, with my family, last July, locating in Wichita, whither some thirty families of my people from Memphis had preceded me.

Immediately upon my arrival they desired that I should organize them into a church. Quite a number of them had been in Wichita for a year, and would not join any of the churches there because of their society affiliating members. I at once proceeded to draw up for them a church covenant in which, with many others, were embodied the following articles:

"We engage to so live that in our daily deportment our lives and conduct shall be a standing protest against the attending of circuses, theaters, and kindred worldly amusements. We engage, furthermore, to use all Gospel means to oppose the spread of secret society influence, believing the same to be un-Christian and detrimental to the cause of God and the progress of his church."

Under this covenant we enrolled fifty persons, all told, and proceeded to do what we could to build up the kingdom of God among them. We soon found out that we had every church in the city against us; and as the people of this western country do most of their own work, our people were unable to give us a support with our large family; hence I succeeded in getting for them a young man without family, who was with us in Memphis, and who is also sound in the faith, to take charge of the work.

In December, I started for Texas, remaining there only two months, when I was called here to take charge of the Warren Street Baptist church of this city. I have been here one week to-day.

I have already sounded the tocsin of war, and although almost broken down in health and pocket, I see I cannot stay at this place. I have had a meeting of the officers of the church, and while they knew my position on the society question they did not know it as it is. They did not know that I was aggressive, and when I read to them my creed or declaration of principles, there was considerable head scratching. The complexion of my board was as follows: Masons 3; Odd-fellows 1; G. A. R., 1; 2 uninitiated. February 11 was my first Sunday. I found a choir composed of worldlings, and an organist who played for church on Sunday and for balls on Monday. I dismissed that conglomeration at once, for they (the choir) occupied one part of the rostrum with the minister.

I do not think I can remain pastor of any church long, but feel that I can do more good on the field—for my field is the world. It is now 11:30 A. M., and I have been discussing for one hour and a half, with a Masonic church member, the un-Christian character of lodgery. I think I have made an impression. Our stay here is simply a matter of bread. Times are hard and money scarce; yet God has promised to let us live, and we believe he will. We are very much discouraged at times, and think we must give up the fight; but when we are brought face to face with this iniquity our soul is stirred and we are up in arms. We often lay at night sleepless, within the last few months, wondering how we could provide for our loved ones, and if it were not better for us if the Master would call us to rest; for go where we will or may, the hissing, venomous tongue of the lodge is against us. I am stopping with a good brother, and he and his wife are under the Masonic ban; and we seldom meet at table but what the question comes up.

I will go home every two or three weeks, but I think my stay here will not be over one month. For the church and world walk side by side. Fair, festival, entertainment of every kind, is the order of the day here. They have had at least one billed prior to my arrival for nearly every day or night for the next thirty days, and all in the church, and I would rather starve than be pastor of a church wedded to such habits of iniquity. So you see I am in it again with war to the very hilt of the sword. I know He is able, but I need prayer and encouragement for the battle before me, and ask those who remember our former battle to stand by me with their prayers; and as the battle rages you shall hear from me, and if I am promptly dismissed, as I expect to be, I shall acquaint you of the fact. Yours,

R. N. COUNTEE.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D.

Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects.

By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON.

16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

OBITUARY.

DR. SAMUEL SIMPSON,

son of Benjamin Simpson and Margaret his wife, was born in Orange county, N. C., April 4, 1818, and died at Garfield, Whitman county, Washington, January 3, 1894.

When he was 10 years old his family emigrated to Indiana, where he was bound as a farmer's boy to A. Lewis. During his minority he received nine months' schooling.

Leaving his home, he went alone to Iowa, in 1842. There he lost his health, but found a friend in Dr. Enos Metcalf (formerly of Massachusetts), a member of the Missionary Baptist church, with whom he began the study of medicine, and again, for a season, attended school. He finished his medical studies under the instruction of Dr. Rollin Whitcomb, in Edgar county, Ill.—a good physician and Christian gentleman.

About that time he married Eliza Chastain, by whom he became the father of two sons, Charles and William.

In 1852 he crossed the plains, and settled in Linn county, Oregon, where he engaged in the practice of medicine and stock-raising.

After reflecting on the dangers through which he and his passed that year, from the prevalence of cholera and attacks of merciless savages, he felt that it was surely through the providence of God that their lives had been spared. These reflections seemed to prepare his mind to receive the truth of the preached Word as presented by a Presbyterian minister, and God blessed it in the salvation of his soul. He united with the Baptist church at Providence, and was baptized, symbolizing his faith in the great doctrine of the resurrection. This was in July, 1854. Thenceforth he could walk in unison with his wife, who was a conscientious Christian woman, until April 26, 1856, when the Lord called her to come up higher, leaving him and their two small boys feeling very lonely in a strange land and, comparatively, among a strange people; but he was ever grateful for the sympathy and kindness of that Christian community.

Feeling, then, a little restless and unhappy, he, for a change, taught school for a few years. In 1859 he moved to the southern part of Linn county, and, on the 11th of October, married Mrs. Emily Smith, of Marion county, who proved to be a helpmeet indeed, and by whom he had two children—Alma and George. Resuming the practice of medicine, he engaged also in the raising and selling of good horses—a business of which he was exceeding fond, and which he continued during his life.

About this time he was licensed by the Avery Bute Baptist church to preach the Gospel, and in 1872 removed with his family and horses to Eastern Oregon. There he remained about eight years. In 1880, with his family, his son-in-law and stock, he removed to Eastern Washington and settled near Garfield, in Whitman county.

A fast friend of education and Christianity, he substantially aided in building schoolhouses and churches and in sustaining a living ministry at home and abroad, all the way between Linn county, Ore., to Spokane Falls in Washington.

About the year 1870 he became acquainted with some ministers of the United Brethren church and, through them, with the anti-secrecy National Christian Association in Chicago. He saw at once that Masonry was the master fraud and deception of the devil and both anti-republican and anti-Christian—most blasphemous and idolatrous. Hence, prizing his honest convictions and principles above the praise of men, he turned his attention to the free distribution of books, tracts and papers, and labored to sustain the anti-secrecy cause in every way, endeavoring to give the people light upon this subject, and deeming it the most necessary missionary work in which any lover of God or man can engage.

But it remained for him to do his greatest work for Christ and humanity while at Garfield, with his children all around him, fully realizing that it is the Christian's duty to provide the means of grace, also, for the rising generation; believing, likewise, that a Christian education free from lodge corruption is all the education that is worthy of the name.

The foregoing particulars of the life of Dr. Samuel Simpson have been gathered and revised from his manuscript autobiography (written with his own hand), which he left in the hands of his son, W. F. Simpson, by whom it was handed to General Secretary Phillips of the National Christian Association. The autobiography closes as follows:

"So I gave one acre of land in the town of Garfield to the Baptist church, and wife and I put $600 into a building on it, and pay out, annually, about $200 for pastor's salary, home and foreign missions and incidental expenses; and also offered to donate forty acres of land adjoining town to the Baptist Association north of Snake river, for the purpose of starting a denominational college at any suitable place in the bounds of the association where the majority vote it, and at this writing worth $3,000, on the following conditions: 1. That the denomination raise $9,000 more within four years from then—October 13, 1883. 2. That no infidel, Roman Catholic, Odd-fellow, or Freemason ever be employed as principal, professor or teacher in said college; and if either one of these conditions were forfeited, then, and in that case, the property should revert back to the donor and his heirs forever.

"Also, about the same time, I gave $4,000, cash, to the American Baptist Publication Society; and made provision, by will, to give 160 acres of land to be divided equally between the home and foreign mission societies, and also 160 acres of land to the National Christian Association, anti-secret, at Chicago.

"And thus you have a brief outline of my work on earth, down to the age of 70 years. I am yet intensely interested in the prohibition and anti-secret causes and woman suffrage.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 1, 1894.

STRIKES, IDLENESS AND SUFFERING.

In a winter of ordinary severity, when tens of thousands of men, women and children are destitute of the necessaries of life, unable to obtain employment, and relying upon public and private charity for their subsistence, it is wonderful to see how many who are dependent upon their daily labor for their daily bread, and have the opportunity of earning fair wages, are ready to strike for higher remuneration, quit their work, and remain idle, because they cannot compel their employers to submit to their rapacity. To a sane man such a course seems the height of madness, as inconsistent as the action of one who would sacrifice his freedom of body, soul and spirit and enter into voluntary slavery for life.

A study of the motives for a strike at such a time and under such circumstances is not creditable to those who are engaged in it. We believe that it largely originates in natural laziness—indisposition to labor steadily and follow the scriptural injunction, to "be content with such things as you have."

We read, the other day, that of 1,000 unemployed men who applied for relief in Cincinnati, only 100 were willing to accept remunerative employment when it was offered to them. Such men deserve nothing; but great sympathy must be felt by every Christian for the suffering wives and children who have to bear the curse of the idleness of their natural protectors.

Many men, too, who would be glad to work for the support of their wives and families are debarred of the privilege, because the labor organizations to which they have surrendered their personal liberty will not permit them to accept work at any wages below the regulation price. Talk of the "protection" of the trades-unions! Thousands have found it but a phantom, luring them on to idleness, poverty and suffering.

Nor is this tyranny of the trades-unions confined to their own members. They repel and persecute the hungry men who would gladly take up the work which the strikers have so injudiciously abandoned; and they extend their animosity, also, to those who offer to give them work, but will not submit to dictation and rapacity. Let the responsibility of strikes and idleness fall where it belongs.

THE LAW OF FREE SPEECH.

The case of Sims, the Wisconsin State Lecturer of the A. P. A., who was threatened with mob violence should he attempt to publicly speak in opposition to Romanism at Kaukauna, and that of the ex-priest McNamara, who was arrested for lecturing upon the same subject in another State, indicated a disposition on the part of their opponents to persecute both by personal violence for exercising the right of free speech. This was clearly in violation of the Constitution and laws of the United States.

Common law provides legal remedies for libels, slanders, etc., and the laws of the several States support the common law in this respect. Common law also forbids a man to exercise personal violence against any man who abuses him, no matter how vehemently, merely by word of mouth, and will punish the man who resents verbal abuse by blows or other physical assault. No words of any man can justify another for striking him. This is the established code. Sims had said unpleasant things in the presence of certain Roman Catholics. So had McNamara. Both had been arrested under process of law, and were entitled to all the privileges of citizens under the law, although they had been placed under bonds to answer to charges of libel or slander. Until they were tried and found guilty, the law could do no more to them. Hence, when these men were threatened by angry mobs, they were entitled to respectful protection by the officers of the law, and the mobs became guilty disturbers of the public peace. Under their bail-bonds Sims and McNamara had a right to go about the streets and highways unmolested—free citizens, and entitled to all immunity from harm. The mobs were clearly the law-breakers.

The experience of agents of the National Christian Association, while lecturing in opposition to secret societies, and distributing anti-secrecy literature in past years, is a parallel case. Their efforts were watched and they were hindered and obstructed by members of lodges to a degree that was no less reprehensible than the treatment accorded to Sims and McNamara, and for a similar cause—exercising the right of free speech, under the United States Constitution, in denunciation of the great evils of the lodge system. Masons and other secret society men resented their expressions with malevolence and even violence.

Yet these agents were reputable men, good citizens and Christian workers. Their opponents, blinded by rage, would not admit this, but abused them as interlopers and liars. The lecturers did not resist unto blood, or make any effort to do so. They merely strove to escape the violence that threatened them. The assaulting parties were the law-breakers.

From what we learn of Sims and McNamara they were reputable men, good citizens, but haters of evil in the concrete or in the abstract, and did not hesitate to say so. If their language was personal to a slanderous degree, they were amenable under the law to punishment after due trial and conviction; but not to the howling mobs by whom they were beset.

OPPOSITION TO THE A. P. A.

The present activity of the American Protective Association, which claims to embrace in its secret lodges and among non-affiliates who endorse its principles and intend to vote as it votes, more than two million voters in the United States, is arousing a vigorous opposition among the Roman Catholics and their friends.

On Thursday evening last (Washington's birthday) 3,000 citizens of Milwaukee, Wis., assembled in a mass meeting, in which great interest was manifested by those present, inasmuch as it was designed to denounce the A. P. A., its principles and methods, and the evil influence which, it was claimed, it is having upon the religious liberty of the republic. The speakers were John T. Kelly and Edward P., a brother of Senator Vilas.

Among other things said by Mr. Kelly, after the enthusiastic adoption of resolutions condemning the character and practices of the A. P. A., were the following:

"There has grown up among us a powerful secret proscriptive organization, having its ramifications in every State of the Union, carrying on a propaganda of slander, disseminating falsehood, disturbing the peace and the harmony of every community into which it has insinuated its presence, sundering the ties of friendship and destroying the sentiments of peace and good will that heretofore bound all classes and all creeds in a bond of common union for their common good. This organization is known as the American Protective Association. It has numerous affiliated branches or orders, some of them open and some of them secret, all of them built upon the same plan, all of them having for their basic principle the proscription of a class of their fellow-citizens on account of their religious belief. This association, it is claimed, numbers at the present time in this country 2,000,000 of voters, each one by a solemn oath sworn to proscribe Catholics in politics, in business and in society. Without the ranks of these various orders, all of which for the purpose of convenience may be grouped under the common appellation of the American Protective Association, there are thousands of sympathizers who, while they deprecate the methods of a sworn secret organization, yet countenance and excuse it by assuming that the causes for its existence are real and not imaginary, and that while it pursues an unpopular method, the object at which it aims is a thoroughly laudable one.

"The alleged grounds for this movement and for the existing sympathy with it against us as Catholic citizens are mainly two. One, that we are aggressively in favor of a division of the public school funds, and of applying them for the purposes of maintaining private and sectarian schools; and the other, that we owe our first allegiance, temporal and spiritual, to a foreign potentate, to-wit, the Pope of Rome, and that, therefore, we cannot be safely permitted to enjoy full rights of citizenship with our fellows.

"At the State Convention of the American Protective Association, held last week in this city, the second plank of the platform adopted by that body, as reported in the public press, reads:

'We shall not oppose any man on account of his religious belief, or his relations to any denomination, so long as he does not make said church relations a factor in politics.

"And the fourth proposition reads:

'We accord to all the right of parental control in matters of education, but are in favor of maintaining the principle of one general unsectarian free school organization.

"And the fifth proposition reads:

'We oppose all efforts on the part of any ecclesiastical or other power, either local or national, to use the public funds for any sectarian purpose.'"

Mr. Kelly also read the published obligation taken by members of the A. P. A.; and then proceeded to make a wholesale denial of all the charges which he had quoted as made by the association against the Roman Catholics. In closing he said:

"In this contest there is, properly speaking, no room for the discussion of doctrinal questions of religious beliefs. It is simply a question of our rights under the Constitution;" and it is remarkable that his defense of the Catholics contained so little argument and so much of assertion. In this respect he differed but slightly from those whom he opposed.

Mr. Vilas, speaking as a non-Catholic and an American citizen, said he understood the object of the American Protective Association to be the social and political ostracism of members of a designated religion. It met in secret and secretly proscribed citizens of a certain faith. If these were the objects and means of the association it could not be too early condemned and in unmistaken language.

GUNS FOR THE A. P. A.

The development incidentally made at Toledo, last week, that one of the A. P. A. councils in that city had secured possession, through a purchasing committee, of 3,000 Winchester rifles, caused an intense excitement. The facts in the case were made public by the treasurer of the committee. A suit brought against the local council by the dealer from whom the guns were bought, led to the exposure of the transaction. The treasurer exhibited a list of persons to whom the rifles had been delivered. Among them he named Mayor Guy G. Major, an acknowledged leader of the order and the one selected at the recent State Convention at Cincinnati as its candidate for governor of Ohio, to succeed William McKinley. Another person was Police Commissioner Egbert Doville, and many others of prominence in Toledo were on the list. Mr. Doville testified that the committee that called upon the dealer for the guns was appointed at a mass meeting of which he was chairman. The A. P. A. society, as an organization, was not responsible for the bill and the committee was not authorized to buy guns, but only to select them.

The members of the American Protective Association testified that the reason they armed themselves was because a general uprising of Catholics all over the United States was expected to start in Chicago on Labor day, last September. It had been reported in the American Protective Association councils that the Catholics were preparing to rise up and kill off all Protestants at one fell swoop. It was to prevent this that the preparations for a religious war were made.

THE LUTHERANS OPPOSE LABOR UNIONS.

A dispatch from Oshkosh, Wis., dated Feb. 3, 1894, announces a new ruling against secret societies by the Lutheran ministers of that city. It is that no one can be a member of the Lutheran church and affiliate with a labor union. Quite recently, members of trades-unions who attempted to unite with the Lutheran church were refused admission.

In explanation of the position taken by the church, Rev. Mr. Dowidat, of that communion, thus describes the attitude of the church towards the unions: "We Lutherans are against labor and trades-unions, because their principles, endeavors and proceedings are against God's commandment.

"The demand and pledge of unconditional submittance to the decision of the majority at all times is against the first commandment and is idolatry. Only God can ask unconditional obedience. God alone is the one whom we should obey unconditionally; whatever God asks of us is right and good. Any man who pledges unconditional obedience to any man, society or union puts God aside for man, makes man to be his master instead of God, and gives man the right to rule over his conscience. Even in case a union has never asked anything wrong of its members, they renounce God by the pledge that they will abide by the decision of the majority at all times.

"The members of a union have to pledge themselves not to divulge the proceedings of a union to any person not a member of the same. The Bible says: 'Woe unto them that seek deep to hide their counsel from the Lord, and their works are in the dark, and they say: Who seeth us and who knoweth us?' Furthermore: 'For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, lest his deeds should be reproved.'

"This is why we Lutherans are against the unions; because their principles, endeavors and proceedings are against the commandments of God."

ANTI-SECRECY LECTURES AT "MOODY'S CHURCH."

In accordance with an invitation from the official board of the Chicago Avenue church, in this city, Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard has consented to give several addresses on oath-bound secrecy in that church. The series, we understand, embrace in this order the following topics: Answering Objections. The History of Initiations. The Oaths of Secret Societies. The Religions of Secret Societies. The Relation of the Lesser Secret Orders to the Greater. Included in this series will be discussions of the effect of secret societies on churches, courts, families and individual character.

The first of these addresses was delivered on the evening of February 19, in the lecture-room of the church, which was well-filled, several hundred persons being present. There were many men in the audience—some from the Moody Institute, with quite a number from the different divisions of the city. Bibles had been distributed among the audience, and, on call, passages of Scripture were read by different persons to show how the spirit of the church, the generosity and benevolence of the Gospel, and the exaltation of Jesus our Lord in the Scriptures contrasted with the spirit and teachings of secret societies.

Mr. J. M. Hitchcock, for more than twenty years superintendent of the Sunday-school connected with the church, in calling the meeting to order, said that all were welcome; that he was glad to tell them that God had been favoring them spiritually with showers of blessings; that although some might fear that the introduction of such a series of topics as were to be presented by Pres. Blanchard on the system of secret societies would interrupt the blessed work in progress in the church, he was confident that these meetings would be found in harmony with the other services of the church.

After prayer by Rev. D. A. Norton, President Blanchard was introduced. He said that nearly twenty-five years had elapsed since he began to lecture upon this subject, and that, in his estimation, its importance in its relation to the best interests of mankind grew with the passing of each year. He spoke without notes, but with great freedom and eloquence in his endeavors to clear away from the minds of the audience such objections to anti-secrecy as they may have been wont to entertain. In general, he showed that every man ought to have an opinion relating to this subject and be ready to bear a true testimony concerning it. Those who heard him were greatly pleased with his presentation of the evils of oath-bound secrecy.

The second lecture of the course was delivered on Monday evening last at the same place. The third—"The Oaths of Secret Societies"—will be given on Monday evening, March 5.

IN MEMORIAM—MRS. CHAS. A. BLANCHARD.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE FACULTY OF WHEATON COLLEGE.

Since it has been our Father's will to take home to himself the wife of our valued President—one who was in other days our co-laborer in the work of this institution—as she has been our friend and helper always, thinking and planning with us and for us in her hours of pain and weakness, even to the end; therefore be it

Resolved, That in all the affliction of this bereaved and beloved family we are afflicted, sorrowing with our President in his sorrow, yet unspeakably glad and gratified in the remembrance that from the "happy home, where God is loved the best," even such a light does not go out to leave it desolate, but bright with the memories of a beautiful past, and radiant with faith in the blessedness of the great future where she has even now exchanged forever earth's weariness for heaven's rest.

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE STUDENTS OF WHEATON COLLEGE.

He, who is our Father and our God, has, in his infinite wisdom, seen best to call from the activities of earth to the rewards of heaven our counselor and loved one, Mrs. Jennie Blanchard. Once more are we called to mourn the loss of one who was dear to us.

Our friend, who has fallen asleep, watched over us and prayed for us as students with all the tenderness and love which only a true heart possesses. Her sympathy toward us was always warm and true; her teachings were pure and clear; her example as a Christian was humble and elevating. As students pursuing the active duties of life, the knowledge that she, in the retirement of her home, was interested in us, that she rejoiced in our successes and grieved over our failures, has been an inspiration to us to press forward and to be more faithful in every duty. The assurance that she ever sought to follow Christ, to take him as her guide and portion in all things, has aided us, and will aid us in our Christian life.

Our hearts go out in love for those whom her motherly counsels cheered and her loving advice helped over the thorny paths of childhood and up the rugged ways of life. Her gentle ministrations have ceased. Their influence will live to all eternity.

While we, as students, lament the removal of the dear companion of our honored President, while we sympathize with him in his deep affliction, yet we are glad that he does not sorrow as one who has no hope. Surely that life of pain was not permitted to be among us so long without a purpose. That soul cannot end with death. We know that no words of ours can comfort him in this sad hour, and yet we feel assured that the divine Comforter has visited him with his solace and proclaimed to the sorrowing heart, "Peace, be still."

RESOLUTIONS ADOPTED BY THE LADIES' ADVISORY BOARD OF WHEATON COLLEGE, FEB. 23, 1894.

WHEREAS, God, in mysterious, yet wise and loving Providence, has taken from us the President of the Ladies' Advisory Board of Wheaton College, Mrs. Jennie C. Blanchard; therefore,

We hereby express to her husband and childred, also to all those who are bereaved by her departure, our tender sympathy with them in their great loss, and our deep appreciation of her ability and efficiency in her supervision of the interests of the students.

That in her death the Ladies' Board has lost a loving, earnest leader, whose enthusiasm kindled ours to do all in our power for the best Christian culture of the young people connected with the college.

—As we go to press on Tuesday morning, the Pennsylvania State Anti-secrecy Convention is in session in the First United Presbyterian church of Philadelphia. The official call, program and the earnest appeals of Rev. W. B. Stoddard have given this convention due prominence in past issues of the Cynosure, and we are looking for a most encouraging report of its proceedings.

wrote to Mr. S., who replied: "I am not at liberty to offer you our church. We have no pastor at present. We had a board of trustees elected, but they did not accept. Mr. A. owns a hall here; I don't believe you can get it for that purpose."

By this time I was determined to speak to the people of Shedd's if I must wait till warm weather and then stand on a dry-goods box.

I wrote to Mr. A., stating the facts. After amother delay, which I learned later was caused by his waiting to consult some of his lodge customers, he answered: "You can have my hall for $1.50—just enough to cover expenses. I will do all I can to secure you a good audience." I had but four days left; so I wired him to announce me for the ninth.

When I arrived there on that date, quite a number were at the depot wondering if I would come. I could hear them say: "I guess that's him," and "that must be him." I learned from Mr. A. that the lodgemen had urged him to have me come. In the evening, before the lecture, quite a number were in a store, discussing the event. An old gentleman took occasion to suggest to them that "they might possibly hear more than they were expecting." I had the hall full, nearly all men, a large number of them lodgemen; and of all the interesting crowds I have ever addressed on the subject this excelled.

At one stage of the address the audience clapped their hands and stamped their feet, so that it was impossible for me to proceed for quite a while. The demonstration was commenced by the few ladies present. It was taken up by the men who were not members of the lodges, much to the mortification of the hoodwinked portion. The only friend I had in the audience, with whom I was acquainted, was Bro. Newman, of Plainview, who kindly came and conveyed me to P. This is the brother who, in October, left the three-link brotherhood and united with the church. During the lecture he sat beside an Odd-fellow, who said to him: "I tell you, Jim, he's giving it to us pretty hard. I am glad I'm too poor to own a pin of these links." My friend replied: "Come up, K.; I've a nice one which I've no earthly use for any more. I'll give it to you." To say that the lodgemen were surprised and discomfited does not express it. The audience responded with quite enough to meet all the expenses.

At the beginning, and also at the close, we kindly challenged them to bring on a man to discuss the subject with us. While we were getting our team, we could hear them saying: "Who can we get? we must get some one."

Anything that can be so stirred up by one weak human effort must be dangerous to society.

We are requested to come to California and help organize an anti-secrecy movement there.

P. B. WILLIAMS.

TRUTH MAKES FREE MEN IN WHEATON.

Revival services have been continued for several weeks in the Methodist Episcopal church at Wheaton, Ill., under the charge of the pastor, Rev. O. F. Matteson. Last week he had the assistance of Rev. N. W. Deveneau, of the French M. E. church, Halsted St., Chicago. Mr. Deveneau is a converted Catholic, and is an able defender of Protestantism in the Chicago M. E. Ministers' Association. Last Thursday evening, in a powerful appeal to the unconverted, based on the record of Noah and the Deluge, he fearlessly classed the "societies and fraternities" that draw away so many to-day from the house of God with the gambling-table, the theater, the minstrel shows, and other vanities of the world to which men give themselves who forget God as did the people who scoffed at Noah in the days when "the ark was a-preparing." Later in the discourse, he denounced infidelity in the person of Ingersoll, who tickles the witless vanity of the crowd about the "mistakes" of Moses, denying God and defying his power, when he has knelt in a Freemason lodge in Peoria and sworn an oath to the God whom he blasphemes. The speaker boldly admonished all who would strike hands in such a society and claim brotherhood with such men. Next evening he spoke quite as fearlessly about the petty despotism that demands that a man shall join our lodge, or our club, or our set, if he wants to get on. A prominent member of the church followed in bolder language—even that we must bring these lodge affiliations up to the bar of God and of conscience and cut them off as we must the right hand or pluck out the right eye, when they come between the soul and God. "Amen," came from the crowded church. The altar space was filled with young converts and inquirers. Thank the Lord for the freedom of the Spirit.

"IF GOD SHALL GUIDE."

Tired and worn a mother sat
At the close of a weary day,
Rocking her babe, which she clasped to her breast
And soothed in a mother's way.
And ever and oft this song she sang—
Her voice on the clear air tenderly rang—
"God, guide my boy with his strong, sure arm,
Then he's forever secure from harm!"

I thought as I heard her singing there,
There in the soft twilight—
"How strong her faith that the One above
Will keep her boy aright!"
"No matter what trouble the years may bear—
No matter what colors the sky may wear,
If God shall guide with his strong, sure arm,
My boy is forever secure from harm!"

Truer words have never been sung
Than the words of this mother's song:
The child she has given in faith to God
Can never entirely go wrong.
For she knows, tho' his feet may sometimes stray,
They will surely return some day, some day—
If God shall guide with his strong, sure arm,
Her boy is forever secure from harm!

HOME FLIES THE DOVE.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

Only three or four men were left at the card-table. The clock had struck twelve, and the landlord had notified the men that time was up. The men rose slowly, put on their hats and started for the door. "A nasty night," said the landlord; "the sooner you get home, the better." One man sat cowering in the corner, his arms folded, and his soft felt hat pulled over his eyes "Come," said the landlord, "time to go home." He rose slowly, and you saw that he had a fine, intelligent face and a graceful figure, while a mass of reddish-brown hair fell upon his shoulders. He stepped to the open door and passed out, and the landlord said, as he closed it after him: 'That man is no common rough or rowdy; he is a gentleman; pity such a fine young man should sink to the level of a common scoundrel."

Meanwhile, the gentleman alluded to was hastening along the sidewalk, his arms still folded, and his hat pulled over his eyes. A drizzling rain was falling, but he heeded it not. He walked slowly, like one in deep thought, and scarcely heeded where he was going, until he was suddenly wakened by a heavy hand laid upon his shoulder. "Hallo, Dove," cried a hearty voice, "in the dumps? You have acted like one in a dream all day. What is the matter, old fellow?"

Young Dove stopped suddenly in his walk, removed his hat, and turning to his friend, said: "I am tired of this life, Jack Sims; I am as unhappy as a condemned criminal. Now don't laugh; hear what I have to say. I have a father and mother somewhere among the mountains of Vermont. Five years ago I ran away. I had a good bringing up, for my parents were Christians, but I became dissatisfied with farm-life and pined for the wild West, and, as I said, I ran away. I have led a wild life; have been a horse-thief, a gambler, a drunkard, and twice have the myrmidons of the law been at my heels, and once I had the end of a rope round my neck, with the other end over a tree, and escaped by the skin of my teeth. Well, as I said, I am tired of this life. Last night, as I was wandering disconsolately about the village, I happened to pass a church. I heard singing, and went in. I sat down in a corner and paid little attention to the services until the closing hymn, and two lines of that hymn have just fastened themselves in my mind. I cannot get them out of my head. They were:

"'Tis not the whole of life to live,
Nor all of death to die."

"'Not the whole of life to live.' Very true. 'Nor all of death to die.' I tell you, Jack, I can't stand this life, and I am going home." "That's right, Dove; I admire your spirit. This life is very unsatisfactory at best, but I am too far gone to reform." "I am going to-night," said Dove, "by the 3 o'clock express, and now I must go if I am to have any sleep to-night." "You are a noble fellow," said Jack, with tears in his eyes; "and I am sorry to part with you." "Are you?" said Dove; "thank you; good bye." They shook hands and parted.

Three days afterward "train twelve" stopped at the little depot of a mountain village in Vermont. Only a few passengers alighted, among whom was a tall, graceful young man with a dark, swarthy face and reddish-brown hair falling upon his shoulders. It was a lovely evening in June; the air was full of sweet scents, and the crescent moon hung low in the western sky. Young Dove, for it was he, walked abstractedly about the village that night until a late hour. Twice he stopped beside a low stone wall, beyond which was a deep ravine; beyond that ravine was a green slope; beyond that slope was a grove of maples, and just beyond that maple grove was his home. "I cannot go there to-night," he said; "I will wait till morning."

The morning dawned, and the soft summer air was all aquiver with the music of church-bells. The Congregational church at the corner was rapidly filling with worshipers, when suddenly a tall young man with reddish-brown hair falling upon his shoulders stole into a seat near the left-hand corner of the pulpit. A window was open at his right hand and two little children sat in front of him. The sermon went on, but he sat with arms folded and head bowed upon his breast and heard not a word. "I am a coward," he said to himself; "I cannot go home; I dare not go. What account can I give of myself? One look from my mother's pure eyes would kill me. I shall start for the West again to-morrow."

One of the children, a little girl, got down from her seat and stood in front of him. She looked at him attentively, and he watched her in a dreamy way. A robin commenced singing in the beech-tree by the window. The sermon had ceased, and, after a brief prelude on the organ, the choir commenced singing. They had scarcely sung three strains when young Dove straightened up in his seat; his eyes flashed; he turned as pale as death; his hands clutched the railing in front of him; his form swayed until he seemed about to fall. And why? Because of what they were singing:

"From the transient and the fading,
Home flies the dove;
To the sky no cloud is shading,
Home flies the dove.
To the land for happy meeting,
To the well-beloved greeting,
From the vain and false and fleeting,
Home flies the dove."

The young man's head dropped on the railing; the robin sang on, but somehow its song and the singing of the choir sounded far away, and yet, how distinctly sounded the words!

"Where it never more is weary,
Home flies the dove;
Where the day is never dreary,
Home flies the dove.
To the rest that is forever,
To the love that changes never,
From its own no more to sever,
Home flies the dove."

The young man saw the child, although his head was bowed upon the railing, but she seemed to expand and grow tall, and behind her shoulders he could see the flutter of fleecy white wings, while the song of the robin drowned the singing of the choir. The meeting was over, the worshipers had gone home, and the sexton was closing the shut ers preparatory to locking up the church. "A good sermon," said Deacon Smith. "Very good," said the sexton. "It is going to rain," said the deacon. "Glad of it," said the sexton, "we need it." "Why," said the deacon, "who is that young man there in the corner?"

They went to him, and the sexton shook him roughly by the shoulder. "Wake up, young man," he said, "we are going home." The young man did not stir. "What is the matter with him?" said the deacon.

The sexton lifted him to a sitting posture. His eyes were closed, and his head fell back, limp and lifeless, upon his shoulder. "Why, mercy on us," cried the deacon. "Who is he?" said the sexton, "do you know him?" "Know him? guess I do; it is Squire Dove's son, that ran away five years ago—Lamartine Dove." "But what is the matter with him? Is he sick, or drunk?" "He is dead," said the deacon.

It was even so. The Dove wandered no more across the earth's wild waste of waters, but had found peace and safety in the Ark which abideth forever underneath the overshadowing wings of God.

A REMINISCENCE OF LUCY STONE.

BY MRS. C. M. CANDEE.

It was in the summer of eighteen hundred forty-four. We were both students in Oberlin, and boarded in the "Ladies' Hall," which, doubtless, would accommodate more persons than any other in the village. The house was managed by Mr. and Mrs. Fairchild, the exemplary parents of the venerable ex-President of Oberlin College.

At that time the institute was, to some extent, a "Manual Labor School," the students keeping their own time, and settling at the close of every month, paying the balance with money.

Oberlin, being early right on the slavery question, had attracted quite a sprinkling of colored families as settlers. These resolved to celebrate the first of August as the anniversary of Emancipation in the West Indies. Accordingly, a committee solicited the use of the ladies' hall for supper for two hundred on the evening of that day, inviting the faculty and a few other friends to partake with them.

A day or two beforehand, while extra arrangements were being made for the supper for the two hundred, in addition to the one hundred and twenty boarders, it fell to the lot of your correspondent to prepare sweetmeats for the occasion, the base of which was dried apples. In the bake-room Mrs. Fairchild herself superintended, with great patience and cheerfulness, the work being mostly done by students. The weather was very warm, and the well-heated bake-room afforded little relief.

About this time Lucy Stone appeared upon the scene. In stature, she was rather below the medium, and very pleasant and witty. She was returning from a recitation, with her books on her arm, and her simple bonnet caught up in her other hand as if to get a better view of surroundings, and finally, when apparently satisfied, she exclaimed: "Oh, dear, Mrs. Fairchild, the fuss of Angus;" and then passed quietly to her own apartment.

Whiteford, Mich., Feb. 12, 1894.

FIGHTING THE MINISTER.

"Don't you think things are rather quiet at our church?"

"I hadn't thought of it," was the good-natured reply of the young business man, arranging himself in the car-seat beside one of the "older brethren."

It was Saturday night, and one of the last trains out of the great city, filled with tired business men, was just departing from the station. These two men, neighbors and members of the same church, it appeared, sat just in front of me. I could not avoid hearing what they said.

"I think we are dull," said the first speaker. He was a little, wiry, gray bunch of nerves, restless as a weather-cock. "We need stirring up. Why, we have not had a genuine interest in our church for three years!"

"Are we not at peace?" answered the young man, folding up his paper. "Are we not out of debt? Have we not a fine property, a number of useful, benevolent enterprises? Do you not look forward to the morrow with a sunny anticipation of the bright walk with your family to the beautiful temple, to the greetings of quiet and well-bred people in the thronged vestibule, and the sense of fraternal interest in each other's welfare? Do you not enjoy the music? And to sit down restfully in one's pew, with the beloved household at one's side, in the house of God; to listen to the wholesome words of our pastor—all this is to me very sweet, and I anticipate it now."

"Yes?" was the sinister response. "But it is very quiet round there."

"Quiet, my dear sir. You keep harping on that," exclaimed the young man with a slight touch of impatience. "You would not have a racket in a church, would you? A church is different from a circus. What else would you have in a church but gentle, loving peace, and the dignity of worship?"

"Well, young man, you are not so old a member as I. I like to see a church active and interested. Now, the trouble with us is we have no debts, no burdens; have lots of nice people who enjoy worshiping together, and go sliding along to heaven on flowery beds of ease. I propose to break this lethargy. I do."

"How, if I may ask?" questioned the young man.

"Well, let's stir up the pastor."

"How stir him up? His kind hands and heart are pretty busy now, I take it."

"No; he needs stirring up. He is getting too comfortable; needs shaking. A good way to employ a lethargic church, in my experience, is to begin to fight the minister. You will observe that those churches which make the most noise in the world every now and then have a savage fight with the pastor. We need one. We do not do very much fighting with sin and Satan nowadays. For my part, I can't; I'm too busy. Besides, it is very hard work to fight sin and Satan, and it's dangerous, too. But it's very safe fighting a poor minister; he can't hit back very hard if he tries. Then, too, you can't fight Satan secretly; you have to come right out and face the devil; for, being a spirit, he knows just who you are, and where you are, and what you are doing. But a simple-hearted pastor, like that young fellow we have now, for instance, would be as blind as a bat in a fight. You could work all in the dark, poke his ribs and pitfall his feet, and then stand off at a safe distance and see him squirm. Oh, it's fun! I tell you," and the old man rubbed his hands at the thought; "for real sport, hunting and fishing are nowhere in comparison with stirring up trouble with a minister and seeing him squirm."

"You have had some experience, I judge," said the young merchant, calmly, yet white with indignation.

"Yes; I've seen and helped to make trouble with the pastor in every church I ever belonged to. You see it is so easy—much easier than attacking the liquor traffic, or public immorality, or any of the crying evils of the day. Let the pastor do all that, and while he is at it begin to assail him in the rear. Censure him on the way he does it. Say you could preach better than that yourself; say you think he is a lover of his own ease; say that he preaches false doctrine. Oh, there are ten thousand ways, for a pastor lives in a glass house. You can't throw a stone amiss at a minister any more than at a woman. Even a whisper is enough. That's why I like it—because it is so easy. I could never go to war, nor fight a duel, because I might get hit in return. I don't like that kind of fighting. Ministers are my game. For a really jolly show I'd prefer a church fight with the pastor to the opera, which I never attend."

"You certainly are not serious in what you are saying?" exclaimed the young merchant, clapping his hand on the old man's shoulder.

"Indeed, I am, though," was the reply. "I hold the preacher responsible for everything that goes wrong in the church, He is paid for it, and paid well—that is, paid as well as most bookkeepers and salesmen. If the pews do not rent, I blame the preacher. If the pews rent too high, and the poor are crowded out, blame the preacher. If the meetings are dull, find fault with him. If the brethren misbehave, lay it all on the preacher's shoulders. Why, we had one preacher who actually found fault with me, because I was not exactly up to the whole law when I went through bankruptcy! I told that man plainly that he was to preach the Gospel, and not business affairs. I don't pay pew-rent to hear about business on Sunday. It's wicked to bring business into the house of the Lord. I hear enough about business all the week. On Sunday I want to hear about heaven. What do I want to hear about giving three feet to the yard, and sixteen ounces to the pound? Nothing. Tell me about heaven. It is that which I want. I don't pretend to keep the whole law. I rely strongly on the Gospel.

"So I struck that fellow. I charged that he was not spiritual. You see that was easy. It took like wild fire. There were lots of our people who did not hanker after such preaching as touched everyday life. They wanted to hear of heaven. So they stood by me, and we made it hot for him, with his yards and ounces. He left. That was before you came. It was great sport to see him move. Had a little house on Franklin street, right alongside of my son's, and took great pride in it, fixing it up better than my boy could afford. Of course he had to sell it at a sacrifice. His children were at school; had to leave. His wife hated to budge. Ah, ha! but they had it fixed so nice, as if to stay forever. But that is not for ministers; they have here no continuing city, but should be seeking one above. I reminded him of it. It costs ministers nothing to move. Home is nothing to them. Their wives are the possession of the church. Their children belong to everybody to train. Bundle them about and see them trot. That's my doctrine. I can't move and so hear different ministers. I have made my home here in Roxbury. Why, the peach-trees in my garden cost me a thousand dollars. I'm a fixture. So let the preachers move, and that gives us variety. Home's home to me."

The young man arose at the next station, saying:

"My dear father in Israel, my dear Aaron, dear Hur, blessed peacemaker, most sweet angel of comfort, thou precious and most lovely Judas, I must bid you farewell. I am not worthy to ride into Roxbury town by your side. For I love the Prince of Peace, and all his sincere preachers. I will be in the next car when this one goes off the track. Adieu, happy old man."—New York Weekly.

"ONE BY ONE."

One by one the sands are flowing,
One by one the moments fall;
Some are coming, some are going,
Do not strive to grasp them all.

One by one thy duties wait thee,
Let thy whole strength go to each;
Let no future dreams elate thee,
Learn thou first what these can teach.

One by one (bright gifts from heaven)
Joys are sent thee here below;
Take them readily when given,
Ready, too, to let them go.

One by one thy griefs shall meet thee,
Do not fear an armed band;
One will fade as others greet thee,
Shadows passing through the land.

Do not look at life's long sorrow;
See how small each moment's pain;
God will help thee for to-morrow,
So each day begin again.

Every hour that fleets so slowly
Has its task to do or bear;
Luminous the crown and holy,
If thou set each gem with care.

Do not linger with regretting,
Or for passing hours despond;
Nor, the daily toil forgetting,
Look too eagerly beyond.

Hours are golden links, God's token,
Reaching heaven; but one by one
Take them, lest the chain be broken
Ere the pilgrimage be done.

TEMPERANCE.

A FINAL SOLUTION OF THE LIQUOR QUESTION.

"The Ohio Wine and Liquor Association held a meeting in this city last week, in the interests of the trade and in opposition to two measures now before the Ohio Legislature, one proposing to increase the Dow tax, the other, to give effective local option. They passed a series of resolutions in which they express themselves in favor of reform in politics and regret that the whisky question should again be injected into politics as an issue, thus causing a large class of citizens to vote in utter disregard of their former party affiliations, and of issues, which their association regards of more general interest," "to the detriment of good government." But the most remarkable declaration is the following:

"All good and wise citizens of the State who value purity in politics and honest and good government higher than temporary party success, have congratulated themselves upon the fact that the saloon and liquor question has not been a factor in State politics since the Owen law of 1886 became the issue, which practically decided the State election of 1889. They have felicitated themselves in the belief that our tax-law and our system of local option, which of all systems is the only efficient one, has taken the saloon out of politics. The laws now in force have been accepted by the people of this State as a final solution of the liquor question, and they are proud of the recognition which our sister-State accorded our system as the wisest solution of the troublous question."

That the saloon, in Ohio, is not in politics, that we have the only efficient system of dealing with the whisky question, and that "the laws now in force have been accepted by the people of this State as a final solution of the liquor question," we confess is news to us, and we are really amused at the ludicrousness of our position. Nearly five years ago we moved into Ohio, and we have been under the impression all this time that Ohio, as well as other States, was seeking a solution of the whisky question, and we have been praying, preaching and voting with that end in view. We have been also worrying ourselves over the evils of the whisky traffic as we seemed to see it carried on in our own city; and now, to think that the whole question was finally settled for the State before we came here, and that there has been in operation all this time, even in our own city, the 'only efficient" system of dealing with the liquor question, and that we did not know it, is positively ludicrous.

But we have this to say in defense of our simple ignorance: If the question is finally settled in Ohio and we have now in operation the 'only efficient" system of dealing with it, then let us move to some other State where the question is not yet finally settled, and where they have no 'efficient" system of dealing with it, for Ohio is the worst whisky-cursed State of the four in which we have hitherto lived.

Talk about the liquor question being settled in Ohio, when we have nearly 50,000 saloons in active operation in the State, whose blasting, blighting, damning influence is felt not only in politics, but in every line of business and trade, in all the ramifications of social life, even in our churches and in our homes, bathing nearly every hearth-stone in this fair land of ours in tears! The association that says so should be branded as a nuisance in civilization, and each of its members as a vampire in society, and all good people should need no other reason for using their influence in favor of the passage of the measures now before the legislature than the fact that such an association opposes them.—Christian Conservator.

THE LAW OF SALOON NUISANCES.

In pronouncing judgment against the liquor dealers on the question of their responsibility for all damages to property caused by the existence of saloons, the Supreme Court of Indiana cited the following extract from "Wood on Nuisances," Sec. 38:

> A place where liquor is sold in excessive quantities, whereby persons become intoxicated, and where frequent brawls result therefrom, is a disorderly house and indictable as a nuisance; for no person has a right to carry on, upon his own premises or elsewhere, for his own gain or amusement, any public business clearly calculated to injure and destroy public morals, or to disturb the public peace.

And the same section shows where the baneful effects of granting licenses come in:

> And while a license to sell liquors will protect a person from prosecution for such sales, it will not protect him from prosecution for an abuse of the authority given him whereby he creates a nuisance.

If the above is good law (which I do not doubt) would it not be better not to grant licenses, and thus to save people the trouble of proving abuse of authority. That is a difficult thing to do, yet everybody knows that saloon-keepers habitually abuse the authority conveyed to them by their licenses.—Geo. R. Scott, in N. Y. Weekly Witness.

NUGGETS.

Last year New York paid for its school bill $4,000,000, and for its drink bill $60,000,000.

The Supreme Court refused to pass on the constitutionality of the South Carolina dispensary law.

Connecticut has now ninety-two no-license to seventy license towns, having made a gain of five this last year.

Twenty-five temperance bills have been introduced in the British Parliament during its sessions since 1892.

The W. C. T. U. of California is circulating petitions requesting the Commissioners of the Midwinter Fair to have exhibits closed on Sunday.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. A hard resting-place.—vs. 10, 11. Jacob, when obliged to flee from the anger of his brother, Esau, went towards Haran, his mother's old home. This was in obedience to the wishes of his parents, to whom, save as regarded the cruel deception practiced on his aged father, he seems to have always yielded filial duty. Rebekah, alarmed at the consequences of her evil counsel, begged him to seek an asylum with her brother Laban "for a few days," little thinking that she was never to see the face of her favorite son again, or of the long years that he would be doomed to spend in a condition little better than servitude. We know not what may be the result when we unwarrantably take matters into our own hands, and do evil that good may come. He hurried his flight, fearing, perhaps, that Esau would follow him, and journeyed about forty miles the first day till he came to Luz, "the place of almond trees." Here, with the stones for a pillow, he passed the night. It was a hard resting-place, yet he seems to have accepted the situation without murmur or complaint. We conquer the hardships of life, not by fretting over them, but by patient acquiescence therein as the will of God.

2. Jacob's dream.—vs. 12–15. Henry makes the quaint remark that "any Israelite, indeed, would be willing to take up with Jacob's pillow, provided he might but have Jacob's dream." No such vision of heavenly glory and beauty ever shone over the downy couch of a king's palace. It was the first time that Jacob had received any manifestation of God's presence. He had not before, when everything went well with him, been prepared to receive or profit by such revelations. This is one of the prime uses of trouble:—to lead men to be dissatisfied with present good and seek something higher. Jacob alone, unprotected, perhaps in danger from wild beasts, his heart sore with parting from home and friends for an indefinite time, felt his weakness, his needs,—felt, in short, that he wanted God. Our mental frame, when we fall asleep, often determines the character of our dreams. They will be much more apt to be pleasant if only holy, tranquil thoughts possess our minds than if we lie down on a prayerless couch, with our last waking thoughts full of the world. Jacob's dream may be considered a beautiful allegory. Our daily blessings, of which we think so little, are a ladder reaching unto heaven; so of all our daily duties performed in the spirit of true service. Nor can we fail to be reminded of Christ, the living Way, through whom alone, as the divine Mediator, we can communicate with heaven. A ladder is composed of many separate steps, one rising above another. We must be willing to place our feet on the lowest round and take one step at a time if we would reach the top. We cannot mount at once to perfection. The steps in Christian attainment are slow and gradual, and taken one by one. And behold, the angels of God ascending and descending on it. Here we have a picture of angelic ministry, ever going and coming, active and tireless. "And behold, the Lord stood above it." Above all our providences stands Providence; above all our good and perfect gifts, the Giver. The covenant with Abraham is again renewed with his weak and faulty descendant; and to this is supplemented an individual blessing, a promise of God's continual presence in all places of his exile, and of final restoration to the land of his fathers. So God has promised to be with every one who trusts him in childlike faith through all his earthly exile, and finally to restore him to the forfeited Paradise lost by Adam's sin.

3. Jacob's awakening.—vs. 16–19. There is a holy fear and dread which every manifestation of God's presence cannot fail to produce in a devout heart. This was the feeling of Jacob when he awoke and said: "Surely the Lord is in this place and I knew it not." So the Lord may be very near to us and we know it not. Let us live in constant remembrance of this truth, thinking and doing and saying nothing that we should fear to have him know. "And Jacob rose up early in the morning"—weary as he was, he could not sleep late after such an experience—and set up the stone for a memorial, pouring oil upon it as the only offering within his reach. He had no lamb out of the flock to offer, and God accepted him according to what he had and not according to what he had not. In after-years Jeroboam set up his golden calf worship at Bethel, and the name was again changed to Bethavan, or the house of iniquity. The most holy places may become shrines of idolatry.

4. Jacob's vow.—vs. 20–22. Jacob's vow has been criticized as a kind of bargaining with the Almighty. This is what it may seem on the face of it; but if we look deeper we may see that Jacob was only solemnly confirming his part of the covenant. On God's side there was the promise to be with him wherever he went, which involved on Jacob's side acceptance of the Lord as his God, with the addition of a free-will offering, the tenth of all he should have. Christians would prosper more, even in temporal things, by a more generous ratio of giving.

LITERATURE.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The February issue of Christian Thought, founded and for ten years edited by Rev. Charles F. Deems, is a memorial number in honor of its late founder and pastor of the "Church of the Strangers." A fine portrait of Dr. Deems is given, and the magazine is filled with tributes to his life and works from many sources. Published by Wilbur B. Ketcham, 2 Cooper Union, New York. Price, 40 cents.

Our Animal Friends for February contains the able address of President Haines at the annual meeting of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, and a choice variety of miscellanies in advocacy of the sublime law of kindness to all—both man and beast, together with much valuable information relating to the care and treatment of domestic animals. This magazine, which costs but 10 cents a month, should be read in every family. Published at No. 10 East 22nd street, New York.

PAMPHLETS.

We are indebted to a thoughtful subscriber for a copy of the "Proceedings of the Forty-first Session of the Rock River Conference of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ, held at Kent, Stephenson Co., Ill.," last September, Bishop Floyd presiding. Cynosure readers will find the testimony of the Conference in opposition to secret societies strongly in harmony with their own. We hope to find room for reprinting it in an early issue.

"An American" has written and printed a pamphlet, which gives no sign of its place of publication, entitled "A. P. A. An Inquiry into the Objects and Purposes of the So called 'American Protective Association.'" It is a strong argument against the existence and operations of this modern "dark-lantern" party. Its "silence and secrecy" as to its origin, however, are calculated to create suspicion as to its veracity.

NOTES.

Miss Anna L. Bicknell, an American lady, who was instructor of the children of one of the ladies of the Imperial household, contributes an article to the March Century on "The Tuileries under the Second Empire." Miss Bicknell was an inmate of the palace at the time of the downfall of the Emperor.

The March St. Nicholas will contain the first act of the new operetta by Palmer Cox, "The Brownies in Fairy-land."

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

BAPTIST.

—The American Baptist Home Mission Society has not reported a debt for seven years, but this year it has already been compelled to borrow $100,000, and will probably report a debt of $120,000 at the close of the ecclesiastical year in April.

—Rev. Dr. George Dana Boardman, of the First Baptist church of Philadelphia, distinguished far beyond his own denomination, has formally announced his intended resignation on May 15. His retirement will be greatly regretted.

—Spurgeon preaches from his tomb to enormous congregations. The thirty-ninth volume of his sermons has just been issued and there are to be thirteen more.

CONGREGATIONALIST.

—Something a little unusual among Protestants was the holding lately of a "retreat" in Westfield, N. J., by the ministers connected with the New Jersey Congregational Conference. Some twenty ministers were in attendance, and there was one public evening meeting, and private meetings for spiritual instruction.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—According to the latest Year-book, Methodism has 28,392 schools, 326,050 officers and teachers, and 2,411,000 scholars.

—Bishop Vincent abolished the color line in the Oklahoma Conference, and distributed the colored charges and people under the superintendence of the three presiding elders.

—Methodists of Lawrenceville, Ohio, have been locked out of the church built for the use of all Christian sects, three of the trustees objecting to their using the church to carry on a revival.

—The London Wesleyan (Methodist Episcopal) council has unanimously committed itself to the principle of undenominational religion in board-schools, and called upon Methodist electors to use their vote and influence in favor of candidates pledged to resist "all attempts either to sectarianize the instruction or to rob it of its Christian character."

PRESBYTERIAN.

—Rev. G. W. Rich, of Payson, Utah, reports a unique ingathering of people at Benjamin, a village near Payson. Some time since almost the whole village left the Mormon church in a body, and now about fifty of them have united with the Presbyterian church in Payson.

—Union Theological Seminary, New York, is to receive the valuable library of the late Dr. Schaff, with the exception of such books as his family may wish to keep. The manuscripts and papers are to go to his son, the Rev. Schley Schaff, who is to be his literary executor.

Y. M. C. A.

—A call has been issued by the World's Central Committee of the Young Men's Christian Associations for the thirteenth International Conference of the Young Men's Christian Associations of all lands, to meet in London, June 1 to 6. This Conference will celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of the organization of the first Young Men's Christian Association by a jubilee meeting in St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of June 5, to be presided over by the Right Reverend the Lord Bishop of Ripon, D. D., and on the evening of June 6 by a great jubilee celebration in Royal Albert Hall, South Kensington, at which Mr. George Williams, the founder of the Association, will speak. It is also proposed that the fiftieth anniversary of the organization be celebrated by associations in all parts of the world by the observance of June 6 and the following Sunday as a jubilee anniversary. Full arrangements for the observance by the American associations will be made in good season by the American International Committee.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—China proper is divided into nineteen provinces. Most Chinese are Buddhists and Confucianists at the same time; many of them are also Taoists. There are about 30,000,000 Mohammedans in China, chiefly found in the northeast and southwest. Roman Catholics number about 1,000,000. Most of the aboriginal hill tribes are still nature-worshipers. Protestant adherents number 60,000. According to Vahl's estimates, there are 66 societies at work in China. There are 12 tract and educational societies, and 6 ladies' societies support workers. Of the other 48 societies, 18 are British, 13 are continental, and 17 American. These societies support about 1,500 missionaries including wives. There are over 100 medical missionaries, and 105 hospitals and dispensaries. Native helpers number over 20,000 and native churches 525. There were over half a million copies of the Bible, in whole or in part, distributed in 1893.—Statesman's Year Book.

—The religious awakening now in progress in Brooklyn has its counterpart in various sections of the West and South. A St. Louis newspaper, which has been collecting statistics of the revival lately in Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas and Texas, estimates that nearly 60,000 conversions have been made in those States, and declares that about 50,000 new members have been added to evangelical churches. The average number of ascertained conversions is 300 for each county. The same newspaper asserts that these statistics cover only about half the results of the revival, none of the larger cities being included. The effect of such work morally and socially cannot be other than wholesome.—Press.

—The two branches of the Mormon church are engaged in a great law-suit in the United States Circuit Court at Kansas City. The suit is a contest between two factions of the Mormon church for the possession of the tract of ground in the city of Independence, familiarly known as Temple Lot. On this property the Mormons expect to some day erect a temple which shall be the most magnificent ever constructed by the hand of man. The suit has been on the dockets of the Federal Court for three years, and during that time both sides have been assiduously gathering testimony and taking depositions of Mormon elders and bishops all over the country.

—Major D. W. Whittle, the evangelist, who has been conducting a series of special religious services at Newport, R. I., which have been largely attended and very successful, slipped on the ice, Jan. 29, striking the back of his head with such force as to cause severe injury, and his physician has forbidden him to continue his work, even advising that the patient do no reading, writing, or similar work for the present.

HOME AND HEALTH.

IT IS WELL TO REMEMBER:

Too small a figure in wall paper destroys the effect.

A basket exposes the clothespins to dust, and the clothes suffer accordingly.

A bread cloth should always be sweet and clean, and never used for any other purpose.

Black cotton hose should be dried and ironed on the wrong side to prevent fading.

Calicoes should be washed in clean water, dried in the shade and turned on the wrong side to dry.

Black and white calicoes are benefited by having a handful of salt added to the rinsing water.

Red tablecloths keep their color if a little borax is added to the rinse water and they are dried in the shade.

A new idea is to have a bath tub on wheels. The tub can be thus filled and wheeled into a bed room, where the bath can be taken.

A good lotion to use for perspiring hands is made of cologne water and belladonna, using about 75 grammes of cologne to 12 of belladonna.

Discolorations from bruises may be prevented and very much helped by applying as quickly as possible a slice of raw beef, or a cloth wrung out in hot water.

Lamps should be kept filled with oil. It is bad for the wick and burner when the oil left over from one evening's reading is made to do duty a second time. The tank should be filled again.

Soft and flabby skin gains firmness of texture by the use of cold water to which has been added a little common salt. Vinegar and spirits of any kind used as a wash about twice a week help to keep the skin firm.

Mattresses are now often made in three pieces. A physician says that thus made a mattress is more durable because the position of the sections can be changed from time to time and the bed kept more even—the wear not coming continuously on any one part, which may have to bear the heaviest burden. For surgical patients this form of mattress is especially convenient.

Housekeepers who have too much principle to throw away stale bread and who cannot bring their families to relish bread pudding, will find they can put their loaves to practical use making what an experienced mother calls "bread omelet." Cut the bread in very thin slices—and there is nothing that one can slice so thin as stale bread—and dip the slices in beaten eggs. Fry in butter. A most substantial, economical and satisfactory dish for breakfast.—Selected.

Every man having a beard should keep it an even and natural color, and if it is not so already, use Buckingham's Dye and appear tidy.

The Best Men Wanted.

"Yes, sir; we want some good men, men of first-class character and ability to represent us. Among our representatives are many of the noblest and best men in America, and parties of that stamp can always find a splendid business opportunity at our establishment." That is the way Mr. B. F. Johnson, of the firm B. F. Johnson & Co., Richmond, Va., stated the case in reference to their advertisement in this paper.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out for dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' aid 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price.. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches it with an earnestness born of conviction.

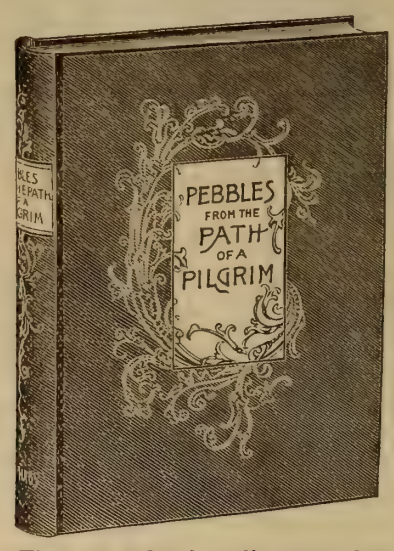
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,

BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by perusing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

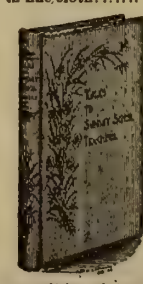
Talks to Sunday-School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75



This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:- Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Teloscope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

Secrecy vs. the Family, State and Church. By Rev. M. S. Dury. The antagonism of organized secrecy to the welfare of the family, state and church, is clearly shown. 10cts each.

FARM NOTES.

ABOUT HORSES.

Don't forget to feed generously.

Horses are made gentle by kindness.

See that the colts have comfortable beds.

Developed sires are coming to the front.

A really choice stallion is the cheapest to buy.

The brood mare should be the best obtainable.

There are about 2,000,000 horses in Great Britain.

Exercise the youngsters and break them to harness.

Study the characteristics of the successful producing dams.

Owners want to learn to sell the first time a fair price is offered.

A horse that is ruined in breaking does not generally get over it.

Mares with the most nerve force produce the fastest trotters and pacers.

Feed the best hay to the weanlings which should be broken to harness.

It is safer to exercise youngsters in harness than to turn them loose in the icy fields.

There is a good market for trotters now, but only at prices consistent with the facts in the case.

Colts in training, if well cared for, grow better and keep in better health than when running at large.

Some horses are endowed with an amount of intelligence and susceptibility that makes them almost human.

It is established that a horse whose individuality is strong enough to create a family type will also fix the color with great uniformity.

First-class fancy animals, suitable for driving and carriage horses, sound and well broken, are reported as scarce and bringing good prices.

Many trotting horses, owing either to natural defects of temperament, to bad training or to imperfect preparation, are exceedingly difficult to control.

NEW YORK BOTANIC GARDEN.

The Botanic Garden which is projected at Bronx Park, New York, has 250 acres of land devoted to it. The last legislature appropriated $250,000 for the use of the Garden on condition that an equal amount should be raised by subscription; this amount has been secured and it is thought the fund can be increased in the same way to the amount of one million dollars. With this sum the garden could start on a career of great usefulness.

FIVE FAMOUS ETCHINGS.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem river at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of falling waters and spray.

No. 3—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4—"999 and the DeWitt Clinton." The Famous Empire State Express Engine "999" which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "DeWitt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railroad science in the past fifty years.

No. 5—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark St., Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address, postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to Geo. H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

RECENT PUBLICATIONS

OF

FLEMING H. REVELL

Modern Ideas of Evolution.

As related to Revelation and Science. By Sir William Dawson, L. L. D., F. R. S., etc. 12 mo, cloth, $1.50.

In popular style, a testing by scientific facts and principles, the validity of that multiform and brilliant philosophy of the universe, which has taken so deep a hold of the science and literature of our times.

The New World of Central Africa

By Mrs. H. Grattan Guinness; with a history of the first Christian mission on the Congo. Maps, Portraits and numerous engravings. 537 pages, 12 mo, $2.00.

This comprehensive volume is as fascinating as the most entertaining romance. Its vivid portrayal of the dark side of African history makes one's blood tingle, while its earnest appeals create an inspiring sympathy with the effort to evangelize its teeming millions.

Power From on High.

By Rev. B. Fay Mills. White vellum paper, 20 cents.

This little work, revised from stenographic notes of Mr. Mills' address before the National Convention of the Y. P. S. C. E., is exceedingly effective.

Matthew Henry's Commentary.

An entirely new large type edition of this inimitable Commentary, in six large 8vo. volumes, fine cloth, $15.00; or, in half Morocco, $18.00.

"Biblical students who are most familiar with the very best commentaries of this generation are most able to appreciate the unfading freshness, the clear analysis, the spiritual force, the quaint humor, and the evangelical richness of Matthew Henry's Exposition of the Old and New Testaments."—New York Observer

"First among the mighty for general usefulness we are bound to mention the man whose name is a household word—MATTHEW HENRY. He is the most pious and pithy, sound and sensible, suggestive and sober, terse and trustworthy."—Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

The Present Tenses of the Blessed Life.

By Rev. F. B. Meyer. 32 mo, 50 cents.

"It is sufficient to say its one direct aim is the present enjoyment of the precious promises. Mr. Meyer's earnest and persuasive teaching in this direction is admirably condensed in these brief chapters."

BY THE SAME AUTHOR:

Christian Living. Cloth, 32 mo, 50 cents.

"A more suggestive and helpful volume it would not be easy to name."—Christian Leader.

The Shepherd Psalm. Cloth, 32 mo, 50c.

As was to have been expected, the recent decisions of Federal judges against the malevolence of trades-unions towards employers and their property, during strikes, has created great indignation among the unions, and denunciations and threats of vengeance are rife. The general opinion among the lodgemen seems to be that they are snubbed in the exercise of some of their most precious privileges—principally that of not having their own way.

The situation in Germany indicates that while the government refuses to admit the Jesuits to the empire, notwithstanding the vote in the reichstag for their admission stood 173 to 136, the Roman Catholics will use the bill and the vote as a club for future emergencies. If at any time the empire is driven to the necessity of asking the support of the Catholic party for some vital measure, it is intimated that such support will be withheld until the Jesuits are legally admitted. "The fine hand of the Jesuit" is not easily disabled.

We give place, to-day, to a very intelligent and full report of the proceedings of the recent convention, at Philadelphia, of the Pennsylvania State Christian Association, opposed to secret societies, February 26 and 27. Some other interesting matters relating to the convention were received so late as to be unavoidably deferred until next week. Among these was a letter from Rev. W. B. Stoddard, in which, among other things, he writes: "The convention turned out just as I expected—'all right.' There seemed to be but one opinion among friends, who, so far as I know, unanimously pronounce it a grand success. Lodgemen, of course, felt that we had come to torment them before their time."

A writer in the New York Catholic Review furnishes the following contrast between Nihilism and Anarchy: "Nihilism was said....to be an effort to destroy the government of Russia, because it was too bad for reformation; but the nihilists asserted that it was their intention to build up a new form of government on the ruins of the old one. The anarchists avow their intention to destroy all governments, and then to maintain a condition of society from which all trace of government or coercion will be absent." If, therefore, nihilism is bad, anarchy is worse—none the less wicked because of its absurdity. In the opposition of the labor unions to the recent decisions of the Federal judges to restrain strikers, we see the outcroppings of nihilism in this country, and we all know what abominable exhibitions have been made here by anarchists. Both are out of place in a republic like ours.

In the thirty-fourth ward of Pittsburgh, Pa., several nuns were recently employed as teachers in the public schools, and, as might have been expected, a great amount of dissatisfaction has been expressed by anti-Catholics in the ward. This week a meeting of the National Board of the National Council of the Daughters of Liberty, a secret "patriotic" order, is to be held in Brooklyn, by whom the action of the Pittsburgh school board will be considered. Concerning this movement, G. E. Kepple, National Councillor, thus expressed his views: "With other officers of the National Board of the Daughters of Liberty I shall hold a consultation to secure assistance and act in concert with the Junior Order of American Mechanics. We believe that the condition of affairs in the thirty-fourth ward is in direct opposition to the spirit of the Constitution, which provides for a complete separation of state and church." State Councillor Kerr, of the Junior O. U. A. M., says the contemplated legal action will be taken in a few days. The outcome of this investigation involves important principles and will be of national interest.

Whenever Christian men capable of grasping important truths are sufficiently free from prejudice to investigate the evils of the lodge system, they are almost certain to give our reform a hearty indorsement. Not only has the Cynosure printed abundance of testimony to this effect during the past twenty years, over the signatures of many of the greatest and best of Americans, but it has also certain testimony that the Christian press of the country is gradually falling into line with it upon this subject. Among notable instances of this kind is the Advance, the well-known advocate of Congregationalism, which, in a recent issue, printed an editorial on the lodge question, described by one of our lecturers as "temperate and Christian in tone, and clear and decisive and correct in its condemnation of secret combinations." The education of the churches and the press in this direction is effective wherever the Holy Spirit is allowed to touch the heart and enlighten the mind. It is his mission to lead men into the light; and unless they reject the light because their deeds are evil, the wickedness of the secret lodge is surely made manifest. In this is our hope and the basis of our prayers.

A few days ago the management of the Erie Railroad issued to each of its division superintendents the following order: "Beginning next Sunday" (March 4), "please arrange not to start common freight trains from division terminals from 12 o'clock Saturday night until 12 o'clock Sunday night, running only fast freight, perishable freight and stock trains, laying off as many switching crews and men in the roundhouses as possible for the day." This means that 4,000 railroad men who have been working seven days a week for years, had a full day's Sabbath rest last Sunday. The passenger service is also being so reduced that the station agents and telegraph operators may obtain a few hours' rest. Altogether the new policy of the management affects nearly 8,000 men, half of whom have twenty-four hours' Sunday relief, and the others a greatly reduced term of labor on that day. The Erie deserves the thanks not only of those by whom its order is directly benefited, but also of all Christians everywhere, since it gives promise of a general Sunday emancipation of railroad employes throughout the country. If the Erie can afford to make this wholesale concession to its employes, other roads can certainly be as liberal to theirs.

On Saturday last, in a privy council held at Windsor Castle, Rt. Hon. William E. Gladstone formally tendered his resignation as Prime Minister of Great Britain. This movement is due largely to the failure of his eyesight, which, it is stated, can only be relieved by a painless surgical operation. Other causes, attendant upon his great age and the growing cares of his position, undoubtedly led to his resignation. Upon his recommendation the Queen appointed Lord Rosebery to succeed Mr. Gladstone. The result of this recommendation and nomination has created unusual commotion among Mr. Gladstone's recent supporters, the Liberals, inasmuch as his successor belongs to the peerage, which is just now the object of their maledictions. The effect of the change in the administration will be to indefinitely postpone a further early consideration of Irish Home Rule in Parliament.

Judge Smith, presiding in the Circuit Court at Galesburgh, Knox county, Ill., on Monday week created a profound sensation in addressing a newly empanneled jury. We quote from the Galesburgh Republican-Register of that date: "The judge wanted them to leave church and secret society out of the jury box, and remarked that a man that would take either of these into a jury box was not a fit man to be a juror. He had recently seen things to make him believe that the influence of these societies or churches had been used in the jury to influence jurors. If a man cannot render a verdict in favor of his worst enemy and against his best friend, he, too, is not fit for a juror. The juror should be absolutely impartial, and divorce himself from all outside influence such as would constitute a bias against a man on trial." The reporter adds that while the attorneys present were stirred by the judge's remarks, so far as could be ascertained, they gave them cordial approval. One of the lawyers said that he had reason to believe that he himself had been defeated in a recent case by influences such as the judge described. Judge Smith is to be commended for his forceful candor.

DOCTRINE AND PRACTICE.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

On a recent day the House of the Massachusetts Legislature abolished the annual State Fast-day, on the ground that it was no longer observed and had become a meaningless farce. After the war the Fourteenth and Fifteenth Amendments to the United States Constitution were adopted, making the black man forever free and conferring the rights of citizenship. But these amendments have been inoperative. Caste and race prejudice in the South have deprived our colored citizens of their constitutional rights. The question now is, Shall these amendments be repealed, or enforced? Utah is knocking at the gates of our capital for admission to Statehood. It is known that twenty-one out of twenty-six counties are polygamous and priest-ridden. Shall we withdraw the hand of the national government from these iniquities, and allow them to practice these abominations without let or hindrance? Shall our Christian civilization be maintained, or shall we become patiently tolerant of barbarism?

1. There is a connection between doctrine and practice. Paul, in his letter to Titus, says: "Speak thou the things which become sound doctrine." Aged men are to "be sober, grave, temperate, sound in faith, in charity, in patience." Aged women are to "be in behaviour as becometh holiness, not false accusers, not given to much wine, teachers of good things." They are to "teach the young women to be sober, to love their husbands, to love their children, to be discreet, chaste, keepers at home, good, obedient to their own husbands, that the Word of God be not blasphemed." Young men are to "be sober-minded." The preacher is to be "a pattern of good works; in doctrine showing uncorruptness, gravity, sincerity, sound speech, that cannot be condemned; that he that is of the contrary part may be ashamed, having no evil thing to say of you." Servants are to be "obedient unto their own masters, and to please them well in all things; not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity; that they may adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour in all things." And all this is confirmed by the fact that this divine revelation, which bringeth salvation, teaches us "that, denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly, in this present world; looking for that blessed hope and the glorious appearing of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ, who gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify unto himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works." These truths have a striking exemplification in the life of Rev. John G. Paton, missionary to the New Hebrides. He was raised in a Scotch Covenanter home. Family worship was observed regularly morning and evening. The worship of God's house was enjoyed regularly every Sabbath. The Sabbath evening was spent in the home, reciting the catechism, reading the Scriptures, memorizing the Psalms and reviewing the sermons of the day. Thus he was well-grounded. These stern principles fitted him for the heroic struggle in putting himself through academy, college, and theological seminary. By his pluck, energy and skill he conquered the rowdies and built up a prosperous school in a village. Then the directors discharged him, to employ a more advanced scholar. He bowed to their decision without a word. And God opened up a field for him as city missionary in Glasgow. In spite of the opposition of Romanists, he built up a great and flourishing mission. Three months after landing on the island of Tanna his wife and child died. He said, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." The Tannese were cannibals. In 1839, Rev. Messrs. Williams and Harris were sent there by the London Missionary Society. Ere they landed on Erromanga, they were slain and eaten. In 1842, Messrs. Turner and Nesbit were sent by the same society. But in less than seven months they had to flee for their lives. When Dr. Paton landed, in 1858, they sought his life. Again and again his house was surrounded by a blood-thirsty mob. But he trusted in God. His prayer always was, "Lord Jesus, protect me, if it be thy will, or take me to thy glory." He went into their midst and kindly but firmly protested against their wickedness. He rushed from village to village to save the lives of newly-made widows, who were strangled, according to their custom, and buried with their husbands. For three years he was the only white man on the island, and then his house was burned and he was driven out, he protesting, "I love the Tannese and desire to lead them to Christ." Bishop Selwyn and Commodore Seymore unite in this testimony of the late A. Clark: "Talk of bravery! Talk of heroism! The man who leads a forlorn hope is a coward in comparison with him, who, on Tanna, thus alone, without a sustaining look or cheering word from one of his own race, regards it as his duty to hold on in the face of such dangers. We read of the soldier, found after the lapse of ages among the ruins of Herculaneum, who stood firm at his post amid the fiery rain destroying all around him, thus manifesting the rigidity of the discipline amongst those armies of ancient Rome which conquered the world. Mr. Paton was subjected to no such iron law. He might, with honor, when offered to him, have sought a temporary asylum in Auckland, where he would have been heartily received. But he was moved by higher considerations. He chose to remain, and God knows whether at this moment he is in the land of the living." "And I like him better for so doing," was the Admiral's comment.

II. Doctrines are to be judged by the lives of those who profess them. The crucial test of a doctrine is: "Does it work well?" "By their fruits ye shall know them." The doctrine of state-rights produced the late war. Joseph Cook said: "I believe in the doctrine of state-rights; but I do not believe in going over Niagara. It is said, the general government had no right to interfere in the New Orleans mob that slew the Italians. But our government had to pay Italy an indemnity. If our government was under obligations to pay an indemnity for the crime, she ought to be able to punish the criminals. So our government ought to have the power to punish these outrages against the colored people of the South. There is a missing link in the United States Constitution. We need a sixteenth amendment to make the last two operative. There are no Christian governments on earth. Christianity is the only solution for caste and race prejudice. This we must have." The Hindoo religion was represented at the World's Parliament of Religions. But that religion teaches impure doctrines. They say, "The cow is a holy animal; woman is a wicked animal." The Naught girls in their temples are nominal priestesses, but real strumpets. They are arrayed gorgeously. When consecrated they place their hand in the hand of an idol and are married to the deity. But their calling is understood; and they bring in great revenues by their unholy commerce. Judged by the lives of their devotees, Brahminism, Buddhism, Confucianism, Mohammedanism, are fit only for destruction.

In the Religious Parliament a Brahmin said: "The vice and immorality which prevail in your large cities prove Christianity to be a failure." But it should be remembered that all who live in Christian lands are not Christians. Dr. Paton said that the greatest evil he had to contend with in the New Hebrides was, the traders from Christian countries coming there, and robbing, debauching and murdering the natives. The islanders always judged Christianity by them. "What manner of persons ought we to be in all holy conversation!" These traders ruthlessly brought the measles to the islands—a deadly disease in that climate, and fully half the people died. The natives attributed this to the missionaries and went about to kill them. They said: "We hate the worship. It condemns us for following the customs of our fathers. It says we have no right to have many wives. We must kill it and the missionaries." Here we have an explanation for the alienation of the masses from our churches. "They hated me without a cause." "The carnal mind is enmity against God." "Ye have loved darkness rather than light, because your deeds were evil." The people avoid the church because they hate its worship, its teachings, and its God.

III. The doctrines of Christianity are elevating in their nature. Dr. Paton relates that Namuri, one of his Anityumese teachers, at the nearest village to the mission-house, was beaten by a mob and driven away. Seeing the Doctor, he cried: "Missi, Missi, quick! and escape for your life! They are coming to kill you; they say they must kill us all to-day, and they have begun with me; for they hate Jehovah and the worship!" After three weeks' nursing the teacher recovered. He desired to return to the village. Dr. Paton pleaded with him not to go. He said: "Missi, when I see them thirsting for my blood, I just see myself when the missionary first came to my island. I desired to murder him, as they now desire to kill me. Had he stayed away for such danger, I would have remained a heathen; but he came, and continued coming to teach us, till, by the grace of God, I was changed to what I am. Now the same God that changed me to this, can change these poor Tannese to love and serve him. I cannot stay away from them." Through the instrumentality of Dr. Paton, the island of Aniva was lifted from idolatry to Christian worship. On Rev. William Geddes' tomb-stone, the Anityumese converts wrote: "When he came, there were no Christians. When he went, there were no heathen." To-day the white-winged missionship, the "Day-spring," and the new missionary steam-auxiliary fly back and forth between the stations, and more than half the people of the islands of New Hebrides have been changed from cannibals to noble Christians.

IV. Doctrines are adorned when embodied in consistent Christian lives. In Psalm 110 the doctrine of Christ's universal mediatorial dominion is stated. By this authority he subdues his foes. By this authority he sends his Spirit. By this Spirit the people are made his devoted followers. They consecrate themselves as a free-will offering. The inward life is manifested in outward obedience. This obedience adorns their persons as the beautiful garments worn by the high priest. Their beauty of character and life is like the dew-drop glistening in the morning sun-light. The true obedience of the Christian adorns the doctrine of Christ's kingship.

A Mason becomes convinced that the lodge is a part of Satan's kingdom. The time and money given there are taken from Christ to help his enemy. He severs his connection with the lodge and lifts up his testimony against it. That is adorning the doctrine of anti-secretism.

A believer is convinced that there is no justification for the Sunday train, the Sunday newspaper, or the Sunday mail. They are a breach of the Sabbath-day. They are neither works of necessity nor mercy. They rob thousands of workmen of their Sabbath-rest and inflict untold evils upon society. He resolves never to use the Sabbath-mail service, nor to be a stockholder or Sabbath patron of a Sabbath-breaking railroad, nor to buy and read the Sunday newspaper. That is adorning the doctrine of holy Sabbath-keeping.

In the Evangelical Alliance at Washington, D. C., it was stated that a manufacturer was involved and had to sell. He went to another and offered his plant for $15,000, adding that it is worth $20,000. This man asked time. When he stated the case to his wife she said: "You ought to give him $20,000 if it is worth that." The next day, he went to his embarrassed friend and said: "I will take your plant and give you $20,000 for it." That is doing unto others as you would have others do unto you. The sons and daughters of the living God are still here. Let us seek and find them.

Phillips Brooks was a famous preacher and a lovely character. But he did not adorn the doctrine of temperance by his habit of social wine-drinking (a habit which he gave up before he died for the sake of helping others); and his smoking habit did not adorn the doctrine of social purity. "Keep thyself pure." "Avoid the appearance of evil." Nip it in the bud. Do not let it show its head. Cut it off in the beginning. "Take heed unto thyself and to the doctrine."

A good Scotch woman went one Sabbath to church to attend a communion. She heard the eloquent Dr. Erskine, and was greatly pleased. So she went back the next Sabbath to hear him again. This time she was greatly disappointed. Going to the doctor, she frankly told him, that last Sabbath she was greatly blessed by his preaching, but to-day she was disappointed. "Well, my good lady," said he, "you came to church last Sabbath to commune with God and he blessed you. To-day you came to hear me and you were disappointed." David said, in Psalm 33, that "praising God" adorns the upright man. A consistent Christian adorns the doctrine of Christ. Paul said to the Corinthians: "Ye are our epistles, known and read of all men." The world lives the lives of God's people. The Lord hath chosen the godly man for himself. His godliness adorns the doctrines of his holy Word.

Boston.

SECRET SOCIETIES.

Are secret societies wrong? No, certainly not. To be sure some people think it is a sin to join them, but then, you know, there are people who think it is a sin to dance, to drink whisky, or to play cards.

Some people object to the oath,—swearing to obey all rules, conceal all secrets, and do anything that may be required of them, without even knowing what these things are; but has not a person a right to swear to do so if he chooses? Did not Herod have a right to swear to give his niece whatever she might wish, even to the half of his kingdom? The result of that oath was not very agreeable to everyone connected with the fulfillment of it, but was Herod to blame for that?

Again, they object to this, that those having reached a certain degree swear to "assist a companion when engaged in any difficulty, and to espouse his cause so as to extricate him from the same, if in their power, whether he be right or wrong; that if the secrets of one having reached this degree be given to them in charge, as such, they shall remain as inviolable in their breasts as in his own, murder and treason not excepted." I should think this would be the most commendable of all the rules. Think how uncomfortable it would make the poor murderer or traitor to be dealt with according to the law of the land! It seems a very fortunate thing for them, and I am sure if I had any friends who were intending to enter either of these professions I should advise them to become Freemasons.

Some object to the terrible penalties that result from the breaking of the oath. One of these is "to have one's throat cut across from ear to ear, his tongue torn out by the roots, and his body buried in the rough sands of the sea where the tide ebbs and flows every twenty-four hours." Another is "to have one's body severed in two, and his bowels torn out and burnt to ashes, and the ashes scattered to the four winds of heaven, his body quartered and dispersed to the four cardinal points of the universe." These do sound a little severe, but then the laws of Freemasonry must be obeyed, and its secrets must be concealed; and if the laws are broken or the secrets revealed, what punishment can be too great for such a terrible offence against truth and right?

What can be too severe where a man deliberately and intentionally tells the truth against one of his brother Masons in a court of justice? But, in order to satisfy those who are opposed to capital punishment, it is stated that there is not positive proof of more than seven persons having met their death in this way.

Then there must be something very romantic and fascinating in being initiated, either blindfolded, with a rope around one's neck, or tied in a bag and immersed in cold water, or in any other way that may be devised. Of course it would not be very enjoyable just at the time, but the remembrance of it and the fun of seeing others initiated would be sufficient compensation for all disadvantages.

But, setting aside the enjoyment connected with the societies, especially to a man who works hard either with body or mind, we can point to a great deal of good being done by them.

Some complain that so much time is taken by them, but in reality a great deal of time is saved. No one wishes for more than one religion; and although the Bible says that "there is but one name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved," still Freemasonry, which does not even allow that name to be mentioned in its public devotions, promises its members that at death they will be at once taken from the lodge below to the Grand Lodge above. Anyone attending lodge one evening in the week will not need to go to church or prayer-meeting and will thus save all Sabbath for rest. Some, of course, belong to more than one society, but that is only for worldly advancement. In some respects secret societies are not so exclusive as the church, for men of nearly all classes and religions are admitted. Ministers, doctors, lawyers, thieves and murderers meet on a common level; and Christians, Jews, Mohammedans and pagans call each other brothers. The Bible, Koran, or the religious book of any people will do for the "book of the law." We have evidence of the purity of the orders from many good men. Some say the church would be a great deal better if it were conducted as the lodge is. Others say the lodge does more good than the church. A minister once said that the question used to be whether one could be a Christian and be a member of a secret society; now the question is whether he can be a Christian and not belong to some secret order.

It is generally admitted that the lodge is a great promoter of happiness in families. When the husband is at his society, the wife has an opportunity to arrange pleasant surprises for him. She also has the privilege of enjoying her own company, while if she had to talk with her husband every evening, what an old story it would get to be, and she would soon fail to appreciate him. Then respect is a very important element in happiness, and every woman respects a man more when he knows more than she does; so of course she will be happier when he has possession of some secrets which he will not tell her. It is a very wise thing, too, that women are not admitted. The societies would soon die if they were, for who ever knew a woman who could keep a secret? A few of the societies have a sort of side show which the women are allowed to enter. This is done in order to quiet the poor, deluded creatures who imagine that they are being wronged and slighted, when, in reality, their liege lords are spending all their time and are striving with their utmost endeavors to promote their happiness.

But even these minor branches are of great importance in advancing the interests of the country. One lady, who has been a church member and a Sister of Rebekah for thirty years, said that if she were compelled to give up either the lodge or the church, she would not hesitate to leave the church. And no one ventures to deny that the church is doing good.

Again, the little organizations that exist in the colleges all over the land may be taken into account. Of course they are of still less importance, yet they are a step in the right direction and should be encouraged. They occasion such good feeling among the students, and by the innocent rivalry they cause, they induce the students to study better, to pay more attention to their literary societies, and in many ways to improve themselves, where, if this rivalry did not exist, there would be no incentive to exertion except, perhaps, some little desire to amount to something in the world; and this we all know is a very unworthy motive.

Then the lodge is a great stepping-stone to fortune and honor. If a young man wishes to enter business, the first and most important thing for him to do is—to learn the principal points of business? No!—but to join a secret society. Then if he has a moderate amount of brains he will be given a situation where one better informed and a Christian will be set aside with scarcely any notice.

A young man about to go West joined the Odd-fellows. He said he would not have become a member of the order only it would give him such an advantage over his companions who were not members. If work was scarce, he would get it in preference to them. He would get a better position, receive better pay, and in many ways be benefited by his membership. He could not explain just how he had a right to these favors more than others; and although I cannot understand it, still others have said it is all right, and it must be so.

If a member dies his family will receive a large amount of money. One lady remarked that she was so glad that her husband had joined another society, because whatever money they received from it could not be taken for debt. He may have borrowed money from his brothers and sisters, from friends and neighbors, and even from girls who worked in other people's kitchens for what they had, but when he dies his family receive a sum which cannot be touched by his creditors. They may swallow their disappointment as best they can while his family ride by in their fine carriage and live in splendor. Surely secret societies are a benefit to that family.

Another man, living in one of the Middle States, was a member of one or more secret orders. His family were accustomed to live well and moved in the so-called higher circles. After a while the gentleman died. He was very deeply in debt. His creditors were nearly all hard-working people. Now, if it had not been for the money which his wife received from the societies, and which could not be touched for debt, she would have had nothing with which to educate her children and would have been obliged to work for a living. True, it may have seemed very necessary for the poor people to have their pay in order to educate their children or to procure some of the comforts of life, but then they belonged to the lower classes and were used to hard work. Besides, if they had received the money they would probably have "forgotten their place" and put on more airs than belonged to their "station," and would have been tempted to "get out of their element." Such a state of affairs would be very liable to break up the Union!

Again, a position of honor can hardly be attained without the aid of the societies. I heard a member of the Methodist church say that he was confident there was not in this country a presiding elder in that church who was not a Freemason. And a large part of the civil offices are filled by members of that order.

A doctor of divinity once said that secret organizations were a great benefit to humanity, for, when a contagious disease broke out in the West and the laws forbade any person or any body having been afflicted with the terrible plague to be carried over the railroads, the doctor's son, in a distant Western city, became a victim to the dread disease. His loving parents were denied the consolation of gazing once more on the features of their son and of having his body interred in the family burial place at home? But no! Freemasonry came to their assistance, and, when the father gave the sign of distress, the railroad employes, held by a stronger bond than that which makes man his brother's keeper, gave room at once for their brother Mason and his precious though dangerous charge. Think of the comfort to the mother's heart to know that her darling son is resting in the quiet cemetery where friends may gather round and keep his grave bright and beautiful with flowers, and not sleeping his last sleep in some dreary and unfrequented spot in the Western wilds! True, this home-coming may be the cause of the death of many other idolized sons and brothers, and of untold misery to many other loving hearts, but what of that? Are not individuals greater than communities? If you are tempted to think of the other desolate homes and broken hearts, put away these thoughts as unworthy of your higher nature. Don't let your sympathy run away with your judgment, but consider again the terrible misfortune it would be to have a grave in the Western prairies.

Another instance: A few years ago, in one of Pennsylvania's towns, a large building was nearly completed. In a sudden storm the entire building fell, burying in its ruins not only workmen but others who had come for shelter from the storm. Some were killed and others more or less injured. Afterwards, in a public meeting where the question of secret societies was being debated, one of those who recovered, relating his experience at that time, said that when he found himself under the fallen building and was expecting death every moment, the thought that he was a member of four secret societies gave him so much pleasure. He knew that his wife would receive thousands of dollars, and that the four societies dressed in uniform and riding in fine carriages would follow the hearse to Greendale cemetery, while if he had not been a member there would probably have been four pall-bearers on foot. After this who can say that secret societies are wrong? Who is heartless enough to wish to deprive a dying man of such comfort as this?

A few of the Christian churches are opposed to secret societies. Among these are the Seventh-day Adventists, branches of the Baptists, Congregationalists, Disciples, Lutherans and Methodists, and the Friends, Dunkers, Mennonites, Moravians, and the Associate, Reformed, and United Presbyterians. Still this should not be taken as proof that they are wrong. Whenever a great reform has been attempted persecution has been sure to follow, and it is quite natural to suppose that these churches are jealous of the vast amount of good done by the lodge. This seems a very reasonable way to explain their opposition, and must surely be the correct one.

Again, there are a few passages in the Bible that have been referred to as forbidding secret societies. In Matt. 5:14–16, Christ says, "Ye are the light of the world. A city that is set on an hill cannot be hid. Neither do men light a candle, and put it under a bushel, but on a candlestick; and it giveth light unto all that are in the house. Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father which is in heaven."

Then in John 3:19–21: "And this is the condemnation, that light is come into the world, and men loved darkness rather than light, because their deeds were evil. For every one that doeth evil hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest his deeds should be reproved. But he that doeth truth cometh to the light, that his deeds may be made manifest that they are wrought in God." And in Eph. 5:11, 12: "And have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them. For it is a shame even to speak of those things which are done of them in secret." And we have the example of Christ, for he said to the high priest, "I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whether the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing."

But then these passages do not refer at all to secret organizations, for—for—well, there are a great many reasons why they are not to be connected with the societies, but, like Josh Billings, "I can't think what they are.—C. G. Jordan, in the Holcad.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

Two interesting questions.—Massachusetts votes against the "color"-line. Masonry in the Rhode Island Legislature. —Free coal for New England.—A pretty incident.—The Salvation Army.

Two questions of practical and absorbing interest which the Hub will have to immediately solve are, "What shall be done for our unemployed?" and, "Shall the old State House go?" To take the most important one first. It is hardly creditable to Boston that her relief fund is almost exhausted, and the Citizens' Relief Committee, who served without pay, is in a quandary what to do unless the wealthy come forward with liberal contributions which will allow of giving employment three days in a week to the men with families, who must starve or become paupers if this pittance is withdrawn. Surely Boston, the fame of whose generosity wherever the sufferers from fire, flood or famine in outside communities have appealed to her for aid is world-wide, will not fail to care for her own poor. Better give them work at any cost than to permit them to become dependents on charity. Her duty to feed the hungry within her borders is not more incumbent upon her than that of preserving their self-respect; and this, in its turn, is much more important than even preserving the State House, though something beyond a mere sentimental interest attaches to the latter question. It was this self-respecting spirit, inherent in a true-born American, which caused so few of the latter to be represented in the crowd which surged into her legislative halls the other day, two thousand strong, threatening to "clean them out" if an immediate answer was not given to their demand for aid. They were chiefly foreigners, with a preponderance of the Italian element, though led by a college-bred American. Gov. Greenhalge proved himself the man for the hour, making a firm, courageous stand for law and order, yet showing sympathy with all that was reasonable and just in their demands. One is a little inclined to wonder how a Democratic governor would have met the exigency. Greenhalge, by the way, though English by birth, is, like ex-Gov. Banks, an example of what Massachusetts can do for her poor boys who are ambitious and bound to succeed, as he has fought his way from obscure poverty to the highest office she can bestow.

But to come back to the State House. The thought of demolishing it ought to cause a pang to every one Massachusetts-born, especially to dwellers in the immediate vicinity of the Hub, to whom it has been a landmark and a beacon so long, unless utterly given over to those Philistine tendencies which would have so remorselessly sacrificed the Old South if Boston's better sentiment had not been aroused in time. Who would wish to see it, with its historic memories, replaced by any such affair as the one at Albany, which, in spite of its vast cost, is only an architectural disgrace? "For indeed," says Ruskin, "the greatest glory of a building is not in its stones or in its gold. Its glory is in its age, and in that deep sense of voicefulness, of stern watching, of mysterious sympathy; nay, even of approval or condemnation which we feel in walls that have long been washed by the passing waves of humanity." Other cities may boast of grand parks and boulevards, and twenty-storied piles of brick and granite, but her old historic Common, King's Chapel, Fanueil Hall, and the Old Granary Burying Ground, are Boston's own sole and unique possession—her birthright, which heaven keep her from ever selling, Esau-like, for a mess of pottage!

I notice that in the late meeting of the League of American Wheelmen in Louisville, Ky., the "color"-line was sharply drawn, and also that Massachusetts, true to her early history and principles, voted solidly against it. No wonder it was by secret ballot.

We sometimes hear of the use of Masonic symbolism in the pulpit, but it is rather a new thing to be introduced into a legislative speech. During a debate on the nine-hour law in the Rhode Island Legislature, last week, Colonel Honey of Newport, speaking ostensibly in the interests of labor, quoted, somewhat to the surprise of his hearers, the language that he used when master of a Masonic lodge, in explaining to the candidate the use of the twenty-four inch gauge. "Divided into twenty-four equal parts, it is emblematic of the twenty-four hours of the day which we are taught to divide into three equal parts; whereby are found eight hours for the service of God and a distressed worthy brother, eight for our usual vocations, and eight for refreshment and sleep." Having read these words from a slip of paper, Col. Honey called upon every Masonic member of the Legislature to remember them and their oath, and to act according to their obligation by passing this bill to ameliorate the condition of oppressed wage-earners. This was putting the Masonic symbolism to a more generous and less restricted use than is commonly done; but, at the same time, an appeal to oaths extra-judicial, and obligations which conflict with the laws of our country, because they are made paramount to them, was decidedly out of place. The "oppressed wage-earners" of Connecticut, be it said in passing, have lost, it is estimated, more than a million dollars in wages during the fourteen months that the Stony Creek strike has lasted. There was great rejoicing in Branford when the Granite Cutters' Union declared it ended, and several of the saloon-keepers celebrated the occasion by giving out free beer. The strike broken only means for them more money paid into their till, for "that which is not bread;" which means for the poor workingman's family only rags and penury. When will Labor awake and organize for the destruction of a foe ten thousand times worse than the most oppressive of the corporations and monopolies against which it rails?

Free coal for New England, from the Provinces, is now much talked of, Nova Scotia, as is well known, having mines of bituminous coal which only need to be worked to give us a large supply. It is said, however, to be more wet because of the greater depth of the underground veins, and to have a larger per centage of sulphur than coal mined in the United States, which would somewhat reduce its value. It is rather interesting to note in this connection that Rev. Thomas Prince, of the Old South, preached a Thanksgiving sermon in that church after the capture of Louisburg (which it will be remembered was by volunteers from Massachusetts, Connecticut and New Hampshire, assisted by an English squadron), in which, though he doubtless tried to improve the occasion to the spiritual good of his hearers, he devoted considerable space to the practical side, and the benefit the island would be to New England, enumerating among other advantages, that "it abounds in the best of pit-coal known in America," and so near the surface as to be easily mined. This was in 1744, when peace principles had made small progress. Therefore we can forgive the good doctor much more easily than we could a divine of the present day for thinking it "worth the while to engage in a war with France, if it were for nothing else but to recover the most important island, with its advantages of woods, sea coal, fishery and free-gift land to the British Empire." But we have learned some valuable truths since this good old Puritan divine fell asleep in 1758, undreaming of the Stamp Act and the Boston Tea Party, and the revolution that was to make us not only no longer a part of the British Empire, but first among the independent nations of the world;—and one is that peaceful reciprocity as a means of national enrichment is much cheaper and more satisfactory than war. Certainly the world "do move." Apropos to this, a Transcript correspondent mentions an incident pretty enough for any artist who wishes to paint a picture illustrative of the golden age when nations shall beat their swords into ploughshares;—rabbits in their timid and innocent play running in and out of the grim mouths of the cannon in the old Boston Arsenal.

However, the Hub has been regularly invested and attacked by the forces of the Salvation Army. Their recent grand parade through the streets was a striking scene, with its "timbrel band" of women-warriors, led by Mrs. Brewer, like another Miriam, and "Joe, the Turk," clad in a bright red suit, but fighting under the cross instead of the crescent. Success to these brave champions in their fearless attack on the strongholds of sin. May they give no rest to the enemy, and victory perch at last on their "red-cross banner!"

Elizabeth E. Flagg.

The facts show that the liquor traffic has prospered under the administration of Republicans as well as Democrats. This fact is conclusive that a vote for either means a vote for the continued prosperity of the liquor traffic.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, Feb. 28, 1894.

The Postoffice authorities, a short time ago, made a rule concerning the issuing of money-orders and the delivery of registered letters, intended to head off the attempt made by the Honduras Lottery Company, understood to be the old Louisiana concern masquerading under a new name, to use the mails in conducting its demoralizing business; and yesterday Vice-President Stevenson laid before the Senate a memorial, signed by a number of prominent residents of Washington, asking for legislation to prevent the continued existence of the Louisiana lottery in Honduras. The matter is receiving the attention of many public men. Of course Congress has no authority to prevent a lottery being run in Honduras, but has ample authority to prevent that or any other lottery doing business in the United States; and if the present laws do not prove stringent enough, there is little doubt that others will be enacted. Congress is fully in line with public sentiment on the lottery question, if not upon all other questions.

The four reports from the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, summing up the several conclusions arrived at by members of that committee on the evidence taken concerning Hawaii, made this week, have not received much attention from Senators up to this time. Whether this is because the diverse nature of the reports have destroyed their value, or because the Senators on the majority side have been all the week engaged in the seemingly herculean task of agreeing upon what changes shall be made in the tariff bill, is more than your correspondent cares to say.

The House of Representatives continues, as it has been for more than two weeks, in what is practically a dead-lock, on account of the absence of a voting quorum, caused by the refusal of the opponents of the bill for the coinage of the seignorage of the silver in the Treasury to vote to make a quorum. The silver men say that the House will not be allowed to transact any other business until this bill is disposed of. This situation is productive of much ill-feeling, and already several more or less disgraceful scenes have taken place on the floor. [The deadlock has since been broken.]

"The Moody and Sankey meetings," said a minister who for obvious reasons must be nameless, "have been in one respect a great success—they have stirred up the church-members of Washington and made them better and more active Christians, and I have no doubt that the good effects will be seen for a long time in nearly all of our churches. But in another respect the three weeks of big meetings have most lamentably failed—the lost sheep has not been found; the shepherds have been devoting themselves to the flock already under shelter." It may seem odd that it should be desired to keep Christians away from religious meetings, but that is just what the managers of the Moody and Sankey meetings would like to do for the remainder of the time these meetings are to continue, if it can be done without offending anybody. It is estimated that more than 90 per cent of the attendance for the three weeks ending last night have been church members. This has defeated the real object of the meetings—the reaching of non-church-goers. These people would attend the meetings if they could get in; but many of them are so situated that they cannot reach the hall early enough to get in, so they don't go at all. Mrs. Cleveland, Mrs. Gresham, Mrs. Carlisle and Mrs. Bissell were among the attendants last night.

Mr. Miner W. Bruce is in charge of a party of Alaskan Esquimaux, brought to Washington for the purpose of reminding Congress that the nation has wards in far-away Alaska who have claims upon us. The last Congress made a small appropriation to stock a portion of Alaska with reindeer to take the place of the seal, walrus and other food and fur-bearing animals which have been destroyed since Alaska came into the possession of the United States, in order that the natives might be able to procure food and clothing. Mr. Bruce says the reindeer taken there with that appropriation have thrived and increased, but that there are not enough of them. Mr. Bruce, with his unique delegation, believed to be the first of its kind to visit the national capital, will appear before the House and Senate Agricultural Committees, to ask that more money be appropriated to increase the supply of reindeer. There are five men, two women and four children in the delegation. They are living here, from choice, just as they do at home—all in one large room, sleeping on the floor in their furs, and having their food served to them in common, upon one platter. They appear to be contented and to be pleased with what they see, but their greasy, stolid-looking faces give little indication of intelligence. Mr. Bruce, who has spent considerable time in Alaska, says they are frugal, industrious and honest, but not inclined to adopt civilized customs. *

THE PENNSYLVANIA ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

HELD AT PHILADELPHIA FEBRUARY 26 AND 27, 1894.

SUMMARY OF PROCEEDINGS.

Pursuant to the published call, the anti-secrecy convention held under the auspices of the Pennsylvania Christian Association assembled in the First United Presbyterian church, Broad and Lombard streets, at 2 P. M., on Monday, Feb. 26.

Rev. W. B. Stoddard called the meeting to order, and introduced Rev. J. P. Stoddard, who opened the devotional exercises by reading Psalm 97.

Rev. Stephen Merritt offered prayer.

In the absence of the President and Secretary of the association, Rev. W. B. Stoddard and Rev. L. G. Jordan were elected President and Secretary pro tem, respectively.

The following committees were appointed:

Committee on Resolutions—Rev. J. H. Leeper, Ezra T. McIntire, and Rev. J. P. Stoddard.

Committee on Finance—Rev. R. C. Wylie, Rev. W. B. Stoddard, and Henry B. Wismer; afterwards supplemented by the addition of T. T. Myers, Philadelphia, and James Parker, of New Jersey.

Committee on Correspondence—Rev. W. G. Martin, Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, J. H. Gordon, and T. T. Myers.

Committee on Enrollment—Rev. James Parker, Rev. Frank L. Haws, Rev. Brunner and T. S. Steel.

Committee on State Work—Rev. T. P. Stevenson, D.D., Rev. Mr. Fidler, and Rev. D. McAllister, D.D.

Rev. J. P. Stoddard then gave a chart-talk on the subject of Masonry, in which an intense interest was manifested by the audience.

Rev. Stephen Merritt, of New York, spoke on his deliverance from the bondage of the lodge. He was followed by E. T. McIntire, of Boston, Mass., and G. Anderson, of Rescue Mission, Camden, N. J.

In the meantime the State President, Rev. S. Collins, of Allegheny, Pa., had come in and was introduced to the audience.

Despite the inclement weather and almost impassable streets, the sympathizers in this movement had gathered in very encouraging numbers, and the enthusiasm manifested was a prophecy of a successful convention throughout.

Miss Ella Carter, of the Boston Conservatory of Music, was present and favored the convention with a song entitled, "If God be for us, who can be against us?"

EVENING SESSION.—The meeting was called to order promptly at 7:30 o'clock. After a short season of prayer, the address of welcome was spoken by Rev. Wm. B. Edgar, pastor of the church in which the convention was held; to which the President, Rev. S. Collins, responded.

The Jordan Quartette sang, "Have Courage, my Boy, to say No!" and then Rev. L. G. Jordan addressed the meeting on "The Minor Secret Societies." He spoke particularly of the numerous little societies which sprung up among his own race, the Negroes in the South, after the war. He characterized these lodges as often nothing more than a secret saloon where young men are led into vice. He also spoke of his successful stand against the secret lodges among his people in Philadelphia during his pastorate here.

After another song by the quartette, Rev. J. P. Stoddard addressed the meeting on the Major Secret Societies, confining himself principally to the Masonic order. He explained the different degrees of Masonry and gave a detailed description of the ridiculous form and symbolic meaning of the initiation in several degrees, together with the horrible oaths required of the candidate. The address made a profound impression upon the hearers.

TUESDAY MORNING.—The chairman called the meeting to order at 9 o'clock. The prayer and conference meeting was led by Rev. A. B. Shelly. The Secretary, L. G. Jordan, being absent, Rev. A. S. Shelly was on motion called to act in his place.

At this point several names were added to the Finance Committee, as above stated. On motion all committees were empowered to fill vacancies in their bodies.

The Committee on Correspondence read letters from the following persons not present: Rev. A. B. Grubb, Philadelphia; Daniel and Hattie Powers, Washington, D. C.; Rev. S. G. Reading, Williamsport; Samuel Jamison, Muddy Creek, Pa.; D. M. Pfantz, Germantown; John G. Stauffer, Quakertown; Jessie Ziegler, Royersford, Pa.; L. Evans, Custer City, Pa.; Nathan Callender, Montdale, Pa.; W. S. Schenck, May's Landing, Pa.

A letter was also read from the Treasurer, Rev. R. C. Wylie, who was detained from attending the convention by the death of his son.

On motion a committee was appointed to draft resolutions of sympathy with Bro. Wylie. The committee reported the following:

WHEREAS, God in his all wise-providence has seen fit to take to himself Cameron Sloan, only son of our brother and sister, Rev. R. C. Wylie and wife,

Resolved, That we express our heartfelt sympathy with them in this deep affliction and pray that the consolation of divine grace may be theirs.

W. B. STODDARD, D. MCALLISTER, } Committee.

The resolution was unanimously adopted.

The report of the Treasurer showed a balance in hand of $65. The report was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Committee on State Work presented the following report:

PITTSBURGH, Pa., May 24, 1893.

The Committee on State Work met in the office of Mr. Corey at 2 P. M. Members present—D. C. Martin and R. C. Wylie. Rev. W. B. Stoddard was also present. R. C. Wylie led in prayer. The chairman appointed R. C. Wylie clerk. The clerk was authorized to procure a book in which to record the minutes and also the treasurer's account. Mr. Stoddard gave a report of his work and the outlook. It was agreed that we pay W. B. Stoddard $50 per month and expenses, less the amount allowed him by the National Christian Association, while engaged in the work in Pennsylvania; and that any agent employed by this committee shall make a monthly report of the work done and give an itemized account of moneys collected and of expenses. It was agreed to send out an appeal for aid in the work and Mr. Martin, with Rev. S. Collins, was appointed to prepare such an appeal. R. C. WYLIE, Clerk.

The above report was on motion received and approved.

Rev. David McAllister's name was added to the Committee on State Work; after which the committee, thus constituted, retired to make nominations for State officers.

During the absence of the committee the attention of the convention was occupied by short addresses, in which J. P. Stoddard, J. H. Leeper, Mrs. Ella Reidy, and others participated.

The committee reported as follows: President, Rev. Samuel Collins, D. D., Allegheny; Vice President, Rev. Allen M. Fretz, Souderton; Treasurer, Edwin P. Sellew, Philadelphia; Cor. Secretary, Rev. J S. T. Milligan, Beaver, Pa. State Committee, Samuel Collins, D. C. Martin, Edwin P. Sellew, Rev. M. Schuh, Allegheny, and John T. Morton.

The report was accepted and adopted seriatim.

A paper entitled, "Where Two Ways Meet in the City of Brotherly Love," written by Josiah W. Leeds, was read in the absence of Bro. Leeds, by W. B. Stoddard. The paper gave a vivid illustration of how vice seeks concealment.

There were some spirited general remarks on the paper, followed by short addresses by Rev. Thos. J. J. Wright, Reading, Rev. J. T. Cameron, Allentown, and others.

The Committee on Correspondence gave in their full report, which was accepted and adopted, as follows:

"Your committee would respectfully report that communications from a great variety of sources have been put in their hands, expressing interest in and desiring success for the work of the convention. Of these expressions some extracts are given below.

"We would recommend the following: 1. That the thanks of the convention are hereby returned to the kind friends and various associations that have manifested an interest in its proceedings and have contributed to its success.

"2. That we do hereby most cordially greet all, whether individuals or organizations, who are testifying and laboring against the evils of the oath-bound secret lodge, bidding them God-speed in their good work, and desiring their continued co-operation and prayers.

"Extracts from letters: From A. B. Grubb, Phila:—'Let me assure you, brethren, that my sympathies are with you and my prayers for the success of the cause. The stand taken by our church is well known. A series of nine reasons adopted by our conference and approved by the General Conference of North America, setting forth why a Mennonite cannot belong to oath-bound secret societies, has received high commendation from good and noble men.'

"Rev. Thos. J. J. Wright:—'Connected with a church thoroughly opposed to the secret society evil, we can impossibly be faithful Christians and be connected with an institution that distinctly ignores Christ. Only one member of my mission is a member of a lodge and he is on the fence, and I hope ere long to be able to get him off.'

"Rev. J. T. Cameron:—'The religion of the lodge makes no distinction between the immoral man and the faithful Christian. It ignores Christ, and makes other religions as on an equality with the Christian religion. My church not only not allows any of its ministers to be lodge members, but also does not admit any lodge members into the church.'

"From S. G. Reading, Williamsport:—'The Christian conscience of this country and the world needs to be aroused in reference to the perils of the lodge. I find many ministers who begin to realize something of the evil of the lodge, but they are too cowardly to speak out.'

"From J. C. Young, Custer City.—(Quoting from resolution of conference, U. B.:) 'The church of Christ is still antagonized by secret societies, one of the arms of the kingdom of darkness. As a branch of the church, we have since our organization been opposed to secret societies as one of the most insidious forms of darkness.'

"From Samuel Jackson, Muddy Creek Forks: 'I hope your convention will be a perfect success. I am most heartily interested in the object had in view.'

"From Daniel and Hattie Powers, Washington, D. C.:—'It has cost us something to be detained from this or any other meeting of anti-secrecy reformers; for we look upon them as the truest, the noblest, and the most zealous and heroic assembly of Christians on the face of the earth. God bless them! Children of God, take courage; put the whole armor on, fasten each piece with prayer, and take the Christian's watchword, Victory!'

"From Jesse Ziegler, Royersford:—'Our church will not receive into fellowship any connected with

CORRESPONDENCE.

WORDS OF KIND APPRECIATION.

COLFAX, Whitman Co., Wash., Feb. 22, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—I have a moment's leisure from the busy cares and arduous work of superintending the Palouse district of the Church of the United Brethren in Christ (Old Constitution), and wish to note a few items that may be of interest to the many readers of your excellent paper.

First—No minister of Christ, with open eyes and tender heart, can fail to see the importance of the work of reformation led by the National Christian Association, especially on the secrecy question. In our county organized secret orders stand up, as so many icebergs, to chill and deaden every beating pulse toward Christ and heaven. Second—The Pacific slope is favored with a grand man in the person of Rev. P. B. Williams, of Oregon, whose very appearance is a refutation to sin. He is a portly man of pleasing address, and a profound, systematic thinker. His lectures are received by the public with marked and telling effect. While he wins the love and esteem of all, he probes to the very bottom, and shows the corruption of the lodge system. As an agent for the Christian Cynosure, he is a living success. Mr. Williams spent the month of November last in the Columbia Basin, or inland empire, the country embraced by the Walla Walla conference of our church. His visit was hailed with gladness by most of the ministers and members of this denomination, as it was also by devout Christians of various other churches, and would have been rewarded with even greater success but for the heavy rains and exceedingly muddy roads, which made it impracticable to throng the lecture-room. The financial pressure of our country, which was intensified by the loss of the wheat-crop, made it impossible to compensate him with money, so his statistical report will not serve to show the estimate placed on his labors. Bro. Williams, as a Gospel preacher, is seldom surpassed. His Sabbath ministrations are worth more than his expenses to any church. Under divine providence may this reformer live long to bless the world, and may many doors open wide before him. Then may kind heaven reward and crown him. I note, last but not least, that all who are receiving your paper, with whom I am acquainted, are highly pleased with it. J. A. Kenoyer, P. E.

TACTICS OF THE A. P. A.

February 16, 1894.

Editor Cynosure:—I wish to inform you of an incident which will tend to show the methods practiced by the A. P. A.

In the little town of Waterford, N. Y., a manufacturing center of some importance, the Roman Catholic priest last year succeeded in securing the abolition of Bible-reading from the public schools. Though his objections were met by the teachers with an ingenious plan by which the Bible was read immediately before school-hours, the opposition of the blind partisans of Rome served only to provoke the Protestant portion of the community to greater activity. So far all was well and good. The A. P. A., however, dropped in and organized a lodge, which has succeeded in obtaining control of the school-board. Their first act of open opposition to the Church of Rome was such a remarkable example of chivalry and of that love for our neighbors which the Christ, the incarnate Love, enjoined upon us, that I must present it for your readers' enlightenment as to the way of this organization.

In one of the schools the janitor has, for some years past, been an old Irish lady, who has no other means of support for herself and her sister. Just recently, however, the board of trustees turned her out, on the charge that she was not properly heating the building, although, as a matter of fact, the building is better heated than the one in the village, where the janitor is a man. In order to have the building properly warmed, they appointed, then, as janitor, an A. P. A. man, whose only qualifications were that he was a Protestant and too constitutionally lazy to work anywhere else. Since the auspicious change, the heat in the building has been mostly of the sort known as latent, but all are happy because Rome is out and the A. P. A. is in.

You have full liberty to cut down or change this in any way that you please. I have tried to give facts only, that you might have an opportunity to show up this enemy to true Christianity in its proper colors.

I beg of you not to print my real name with this article, as my father and myself are "under the ban" because, as true Christians should, we strive to love our neighbors, though we abhor the chains of the Scarlet Woman by which they are bound. A Friend of the Cynosure.

THE LIGHT HAS COME.

"We have, then, the implied testimony of Freemasons themselves, that the Christian church ought to have no fellowship with Freemasonry as thus revealed, and that those who adhere intelligently and determinedly to such an institution have no right to be in the Christian church. God demands, and the world has a right to expect, that the church will take due action and bear a truthful testimony in respect to this institution. She cannot now innocently hold her peace. The light has come. Fidelity to God and to the souls of men require that the church, which is the light of the world, should speak out, and should take such action as will plainly reveal her views of the compatibility or incompatibility of Freemasonry with the Christian religion."—From Pres. Finney's book, "Character, Claims and Practical Workings of Freemasonry," pp. 260, 263.

White vellum cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.75

D. L. Moody says: "Few books of recent years are better adapted to instruct and help Christians than those of this author. He is a man mighty in the scriptures, saturated with Bible facts and truths."

PRAYERS FROM THE POETS.

By Martha Harger. 16mo, two colored cloth, gilt top..... 1.00
Leatherette, boxed..... 1.50

"This volume is admirable. The Prayer are better suited to some of our moods than formal Litanies and are selected from excellent sources. The book will be a dear treasure to many hearts."—The Churchman.

KIN-DA-SHON'S WIFE.

An Alaskan Story. By Mrs. Eugene S. Willard, Home Missionary of the Presbyterian Board of America to Alaska. With illustrations. 8vo, cloth..... 1.50

"Being a close observer and in deep sympathy with the native population in their struggles towards a Christian Civilization, Mrs. Willard has gained a more intelligent knowledge of their character, of their needs and hindrances, than perhaps any other person."—Dr. Sheldon Jackson.

HEROES OF THE GOODWIN SANDS.

By Rev. Thomas Stanley Treanor. With many illustrations. 8vo, Cloth..... 1.50

"It is a book of most engrossing interest, and as stimulating as it is readable."—The Record.
"The deeds of daring are thrilling in the extreme. Suitable for the public library or for the home."—Times.

THE GREAT LONDON DAILIES.

By H. W. Massingham. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, cloth..... 1.00

Very welcome to all who like to look behind the scenes and see how the great London dailies are worked.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. Lewis O. Thompson. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. Arthur

T. Pierson, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By Hannah Whitall Smith. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different

Aspects. By W. P. Mackay, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. Briggs. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H.

Spurgeon. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

OBITUARY.

MRS. JENNIE CAROTHERS BLANCHARD

was born in York Center, Du Page Co., Ill., Jan. 23, 1854. Here she lived with her parents, brothers and sisters until 1870, when the family removed to Guthrie Center, Guthrie Co., Iowa. During the year which followed this latter date she spent her summers at home, but was during the larger part of the time at Wheaton College, in which she began work as a student in 1869 and as a teacher in 1879. In this institution she spent about fourteen years, six as a pupil, one as Instructor in English and seven as Principal of the Ladies' Department. In 1886 she was married at her home in Iowa to Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard, and returned to Wheaton. She was the mother of three children, one of whom, Marie, passed into the better land before her.

In 1891, symptoms of cancer appeared, but it was hoped that the disease might not so prove. Toward the latter part of this year it seemed that hopes were disappointed and she began treatment for this trouble. In January, 1892, she went to Chicago, and remained for some months, but received no benefit. Returning to her home in June, she had from that time alternations of improved and failing health. During the last two months of her life she was weaker and suffered much from a cough. On the night of Friday, February 10th, she had a hard time, breathing with great difficulty. In the morning she seemed better, but was wearied and longed for sleep and rest. About six o'clock she repeated five or six times the words: "God is good." "God is good." "Who healeth all my diseases." "Why may I not say that and believe it until I know that it is not God's plan for me?" After this she slept for a few minutes, a number of times. About eight o'clock she became more quiet and soon after passed without a struggle into the presence of the Saviour whom she has loved and served so faithfully.

Even as a child she was remarkable for the strength and beauty of her character, and deeply impressed the most thoughtful persons who knew her. Becoming a student, she was kind, genial, patient and persevering, doing thoroughly all that was committed to her. The same characteristics marked her as a teacher. The work was hard and the compensation small, yet she labored on with perfect cheerfulness, "glad," as she said a few days before her death, "to do the work." She united with the College church in 1874, though she had made a profession of faith in Jesus some time before. In 1883 a meeting was held for some months in Wheaton by several brethren who were then or thereafter members of the Free Methodist church. She attended these meetings and greatly desired a higher state of grace, a closer walk with God. After long struggle and prayer, in her own room, meditating on the words "purifying their hearts by faith," she entered into the rest of faith. Her outward life was little if at all changed by this experience, but the serene and quiet depths of her being were ever thereafter undisturbed. She was not anxious or troubled about anything, not even the approach of death.

As a Christian, both before and after 1883, she exhibited all the traits which distinguished her as a student and teacher. She was blameless and faithful. Nothing that seemed duty daunted her. During the latter part of her work as a teacher she attended regularly five meetings every Lord's day, and labored steadily at other times for the spiritual uplifting of the young people committed to her care. A number since her illness have said that she was the one who led them to Jesus. There are many others who will say the same.

Her life as wife and mother was a continuation of the loving, faithful, self-denying service to which she had become accustomed. She formed the character of the four motherless girls to whom she became a mother and cared for her own little ones without a thought of anything but what was right and pleasing to God. She sympathized with the work of her husband in the college, the opposition to secret societies, the labor for the prohibition of the sale of liquor, and the preservation of the Sabbath. She bore with perfect cheerfulness more than her share of any crosses that were associated with these testimonies.

Over and again during her illness she gave utterance to the language of triumphant faith. She earnestly desired to live and labor, but had never the least insubmission to the will of God. It had seemed to us that God purposed to raise her up, and the times when death was just at hand but passed us by strengthened this hope and expectation. It has not been as we desired, yet we know that God is good and in mercy he afflicts us.

The tireless kindness of our dear neighbors and friends has been a comfort and blessing. During all these months the flowers that she loved have been abundantly supplied and other continual tokens of love have made more smooth the path in which she has walked. Over and again she has said: "What good neighbors we have. How thankful we should be for them." Some may say that her life is ended. This is far from the truth. It is not ended nor can it ever end. The forces of good which she has set in motion are all at work, never more forcefully than to-day. They will continue to operate until time shall be no more and will then go on in ever widening circles throughout the ages of eternity.—Wheaton College Record.

TAKE STEPS IN TIME. When your blood is out of order, you can't afford to wait. A slight cold, in this scrofulous condition, is enough to threaten you with Consumption. At the first symptom of any weakness in the lungs, or with any cough that you can't seem to get rid of, you should take Doctor Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery. For Consumption itself, except in the most advanced stages, and for all the conditions that lead to it, this is a positive and proved remedy.

Consumption is Lung-Scrofula. You must depend upon the blood for a cure. The "Discovery" reaches it, through the blood, as nothing else can. Not only this, but every form of Scrofula. In Consumption, Weak Lungs, Severe Lingering Coughs, Asthma, and all Bronchial, Throat and Lung Affections, it is guaranteed to benefit or cure, or your money is returned.

For Colic, Diarrhea, Dysentery, Cholera Morbus and Cholera Infantum, take Dr. Pierce's Compound Extract of Smart-Weed.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 8, 1894.

LABOR AND ANARCHY.

The workingmen of the United States have evidently made a serious mistake in electing Mr. James Sovereign successor to Master-Workman Powderly, if certain expressions of his in the secular newspapers are indicative of his opinions and policy. His maledictions against society as the enemy of labor and labor organizations extended to the Church of Christ and its Founder. In this, however, he differs but little from the generality of labor orators and "bosses." He denounced the courts because, at his dictation, they declined to assume the legislative and judicial functions of the Federal government. He advocated the cause of a convict, now in the penitentiary serving time, who led a conspiracy to poison non-union workingmen that resulted in the death of many. He heaped upon the industrial system the responsibility for all the reckless, idle tramps that infest the land. He failed to note the close connection existing between the liquor traffic and the vice, degradation and destitution that everywhere prevail. He also, in the name of his subordinates, assumed the responsibility of saying that if ever they come into power, and certain conditions should prevail, they will not hesitate to repudiate the obligations of the national government and rob its creditors. In conclusion he predicted a social revolution, sooner or later, to be caused by the uprising of 3,000,000 unemployed persons, that will "carry death and destruction to every class of American society." This man, be it remembered, is at the head of the most powerful labor federation in the United States, and his principles are those of an anarchist and the outgrowth of a tyrannical and ungodly secretism.

A BIT OF NATIONAL FINANCIERING.

Within the past few weeks the phrase "coining the seigniorages," forming the basis of a bill introduced in Congress by Mr. Bland, has frequently appeared in the public prints. To many, no doubt, it has been a meaningless phrase, inasmuch as very few papers have given it a comprehensive definition. The following explanation of it, from the New York Tribune, may not, therefore, be amiss:

> Under the Act of 1890 the Treasury has purchased certain silver bullion which, by express provision of that law, it is required to hold against the new treasury-notes issued in its purchase. The amount of notes issued exactly represented the market-value of the bullion when purchased, which was less by about $55,000,000 than the number of standard silver dollars which could be coined from the same bullion, if that metal, now selling for about 65 cents per ounce, should be reckoned worth $1.29¼ per ounce.

Mr. Bland's bill is based upon the allegation (right or wrong) that this bullion has a value greater by $55,000,000, than the sum paid for it. On this ground Mr. Bland's bill proposes to have the government issue more paper certificates, to the value of $55,000,000, for general circulation, redeemable in silver dollars only.

On Thursday last Mr. Bland's bill was passed in the lower house of Congress by a vote of 167 to 130. It now goes to the Senate for approval or rejection.

SHE FAVORS THE LODGE SYSTEM.

Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Lease, who is still President of the State Board of Charities in Kansas, in spite of all the efforts of Gov. Lewelling to unseat her, lectured in Chicago last week, on "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" under the auspices of one of the women's clubs. In her discourse she discussed the more prominent features of the present social distress and its causes, showing that there is no reason for its existence, and that the true remedy for it lies in the application of the basic principles of Christianity.

To a reporter who questioned her as to her aspirations to become a Mason, Mrs. Lease replied, with a hearty laugh: "Of course, I am not a Mason and never said I was, although I wear an emblem of the order. The report originated in my assertion that the time had come when women should bind themselves together for mutual aid and protection in an oath-bound organization in line with Masonry. And I don't see why women shouldn't be eligible to become Masons. The discrimination against the sex in this as in other instances is but an old prejudice which is fast passing away. Equal suffrage is the keynote of human progress."

Although she had heard of two Duluth ladies being "adopted" into Masonry by a Duluth lodge, Mrs. Lease said she had no aspirations in that direction. She is not even a member of the Eastern Star, to which wives, sisters, and daughters of Masons are eligible, and which she alluded to as a mere sop thrown to the gentler sex.

"The cause of woman suffrage," she said, "is forging ahead. Several State legislatures are discussing equal rights bills. Next year in Kansas we vote to strike the word 'male' from the constitution."

We think Mrs. Lease is too good a woman to unite with Freemasons, especially after she learns to know them as well as do those who have made them a study.

MASONRY IN SOUTH AFRICA.

An estimable lady, employed as a missionary in the Congregational mission in South Africa, finding her work much hindered by the influence of Freemasonry upon the natives, has been distributing anti-secrecy literature in her district, with more or less effect. Finding that the power of the lodge is very strong, she appealed, by letters, to the New York Independent and other leading papers of her denomination, to combat secret societies as a positive duty to God and those who are engaged in his work.

We are informed that her appeal to the Independent was unheeded, and it is manifest that Congregational papers are averse to discussing the subject of lodge-evils. On one or two occasions, however, the Advance has proved itself an honorable exception, for it has spoken both plainly and judiciously against the detrimental influences which the lodges are wielding upon Christianity and its professed followers.

As an evidence that the missionary has not written unintelligently concerning the things of which she complains, we have before us a clipping from the Natal (South Africa) Mercury of December 4, 1893, in which occurs an account, covering one and a half columns of fine type, of the laying of the foundation stone of a new Masonic hall in that city, "with imposing ceremonies, and attended with all the ritualistic pomp of which the craft is capable." Large space is given to the dimensions and splendor of the edifice, the list of magnates in attendance, and the addresses made on this occasion.

One of these Masonic orators, among other characteristic sentiments, gave utterance to the following: "Know all of you that we be lawful Masons, true to the laws of our country, and established of old with peace and honor in most countries to do good to our brethren, to build great buildings, and to fear God, who is the great Architect of all things. We have among us, concealed from the eyes of all men, secrets which may not be revealed and which no man has discovered; but these secrets are lawful and honorable, to be known by Masons, who only have the keeping of them, to the end of time. Unless our craft were good and our calling honorable we should not have lasted so many centuries, nor should we have had so many illustrious brothers in our order ready to promote our laws and further our interests. To-day we are here assembled in the presence of you all, to build a house which we pray God may prosper, if it seem good to him, that it may become a building for good men and good deeds and promote harmony and brotherly love so long as it shall endure. So mote it be!"

This harangue is exclusively Masonic, and full of claptrap for catching the unwary by impressing them with its pseudo-religious sentiments. There is in it nothing of Christ or his kingdom—only the vagueness of deism, which may extend to all heathen gods, with many of which the native religion of Africa abounds.

As another speaker expressed it, at a later period in the ceremonies: "He and all who loved their ancient craft felt there was something more in Freemasonry than appeared to the casual observer." The orator (a District Grand Master of the order) was right. For twenty years and more the N. C. A. has been trying to impress this truth upon the world, and has so far succeeded (thank God!) that all the nooks and corners of Masonic secrecy have been laid open to those who care to know the vileness that it covers. Then he went on: "They" (all who loved their ancient craft and craftiness, as aforesaid) "felt and knew it to be a religious institution, free from the narrow limits and domination of particular sects"—and from Christianity, too, he might have added, for it is the truth. "It was a benevolent institution, from which no member hoped or expected to receive any pecuniary aid."

If this is true, then Freemasonry is not as benevolent as a common insurance company. Both the fraternity and the insurance company require dues and premiums to be paid in cash at the outset and in installments. The insurance company contracts therefor to pay certain liberal sums of money to the beneficiary, dependent upon certain contingencies. The Mason pays his dues and installments into the lodge with the certainity that he will, in no contingency, be able to demand a single cent for his relief. The benefits he is to receive for his money are of a social sort—a fabulous benevolence that reminds one of the Apostle James' description. James 2: 15, 16. It includes showy parades and luxurious banquets, open only to "brethren of the mystic tie." Yes, they have "charity balls" for the benefit of Masonic (exclusively Masonic) institutions; but the records of the lodges show that but a third (at most) of the annual receipts are assigned to even these objects of donations.

Reverting to the lady's complaint and the coolness with which it has been received, we ask, with a desire to obtain an intelligent answer: Whoever heard of a donation from a Freemasons' lodge to a Christian missionary fund? When that question is answered correctly, we shall have more to ask. For the present this will suffice.

THE CORNELL OUTRAGE.

Cornell University, at Ithaca, N. Y., is under the ban of public opinion for the disgraceful event which occurred there on the evening of February 21. It is claimed by the students that the occurrence has been exaggerated in its publication, yet they acknowledge that the truth is a disgrace to the institution. The details, as we gather them from the press reports, were as follows. We quote from a dispatch dated Rochester, N. Y., Feb. 22:

> At Cornell University, last night, the sophomores, in attempting to break up the freshmen banquet, generated chlorine gas. Several students were overcome by the fumes and carried out unconscious, and a Negro woman employed as cook died from the fumes of the gas.
> The poisoning was the result of the annual class riot following the freshmen banquet at the old Masonic hall on Tioga street. For a week previous the under-classmen had been at swords' points. Numerous hazings had occurred and more than once had the class spirit outreached its proper bounds. On one occasion a sophomore, who was attacked by a crowd of freshmen, drew a revolver and snapped away at the trigger, but found to his disappointment that the weapon was empty.
> Last night, however, the spirit reached its height. The city officials tripled the regular police force and added a large number of specials. The freshmen congregated on the campus and started down the hill to have their feast. When they reached the hall where they were to hold their banquet they were met by 400 or 500 sophomores, "townies" and seniors, who proceeded to prevent their entrance to the building. Potatoes, eggs, stones and what-not flew thick and fast.
> In the melee two of the rushers were seized by the policemen and quickly dragged to the station, where they were locked up. While the multitude was following the officers, trying to effect the escape of the prisoners, the freshmen quietly stole up the stairs and held their spread; after which they indulged in toasts and college songs.
> Later the sophomores filled the hall with noxious gases and soon several freshmen were carried out insensible.
> A corps of physicians were summoned. Prompt efforts were made to resuscitate the asphyxiated students by the application of ammonia and stimulants. The hall was placed in the possession of the police, who ransacked the corridors and side rooms to find the source of the gas.
> Miss Jackson a colored woman who acted as a cook for the students, died this morning. She was taken from the hall insensible to the residence of Dr. Lockery. The doctors say that she had been subject to heart trouble and weak lungs.
> This morning Thomas McNeil, a freshman from Pittsburg, died from the effects of the poison.
> A vigorous investigation as to the cause of the trouble showed that some one had entered the room underneath the kitchen and bored two holes in the ceiling above. On the table stood a large jar uncorked. Through the cork were two rubber tubes which ran up to the ceiling, where they were connected with two glass tubes. These ran through the holes in the floor, thus liberating in the room above the gas generated from the jug, which was found to be chlorine, a mixture of salt and sulphuric acid.
> There was, however, no clew to the party who had been guilty of this dastardly act.

A few days after the banquet more than 1,000 of the students of the university gathered to take action regarding the tragedy. None of the faculty or trustees of the institution was present. It was entirely a students' meeting; and the following declaration was adopted:

"We, the students of Cornell University, in mass-meeting assembled, formally express our regret at the deplorable occurrences connected with the recent freshmen banquet, which, allowing for falsified and highly-colored statements, have, nevertheless, disgraced the university in the eyes of the public. We disavow the acts as the acts of individuals unauthorized by any class or body of students in the university. We assure the civil authorities of our sympathy and co-operation in their efforts to bring the offenders to justice."

The good name of Cornell is at stake until the perpetrators of this foul deed are properly punished. Let the blame rest where it belongs.

Since the foregoing was written four of the students have been placed under arrest for refusing to answer questions asked during the legal investigation of the outrage.

—With regard to Hawaii, the Christian Instructor has only this to say: "That when the government, which is one in all different administrations, recognizes another government as established in fact, and then joins with its enemies to overthrow it, it makes itself a transgressor."

—The present winter has witnessed some of the most effective religious revivals that have been recorded for years, especially in the Western and Southwestern States. In 177 counties of Missouri, Illinois, Kansas, Arkansas and Texas 54,000 converts are reported, of whom 49,000 have been received into evangelical churches. This is cheering news.

—At the meeting of the State convention of the A. P. A. in Michigan, recently, at which 75,000 members were represented, a desire was manifested to make the order less secret in its work. This, however, was strongly opposed by others, who desire that nothing about their order should by made public, especially the number of its membership. The lodge element won.

—Hon. Theodore Roosevelt, of the Civil Service Commission, writes to the American Citizen that "True Americanism is as absolutely alien to Know-nothingism, on the one hand, as it is to every form of foreignism on the other." That is, that every American citizen of foreign birth should leave his old prejudices, racial and political, in the old country and be an American citizen in theory and practice all the time. It is good advice.

—The editor of the Cynosure is compelled to ask his numerous correspondents to exercise the Christian virtue of patience towards him. His desk is overflowing with a mass of excellent communications on various topics connected with our reform, that would fill the columns of several papers. As fast as possible they will be given to the public in the glory of print; but it may be that in the consequent concatenation of events, the first be last and vice versa.

—A bill which was recently passed in the New York Legislature, and is now a law, provides for the submission to the people, at next fall's election, of a proposition to annex fourteen distinct cities, villages and townships to the city of New York. If the proposition is adopted, the population of our greatest metropolis will be increased, probably, between one or two millions. Envy of Chicago's rapid growth, it is alleged, has been the basis of this movement.

—In answer to a deputation which waited upon him to protest against the violent character of the anti-semitic movement, and especially against the boycotting of Jewish shopkeepers in Vienna, the Austrian premier has declared the resolution of the government to extend the full protection of the law to the members of every recognized church and religious society, including the Jews. This declaration of religious freedom in Germany, which admits Jesuits, indicates a very low estimate of Christianity and a liberalism that embraces all forms of false religions.

—The course of three lectures on secret societies delivered at Chicago Avenue church, in this city, by Pres. C. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton College, has been well attended on each Monday evening, and received with deep attention. The last of the lectures was given on Monday of this week. It was devoted to the obligations and religious character of the oath-bound fraternities, which were ably presented. During the course encouraging letters were read from Rev. Dr. E. P. Goodwin, of the First Congregational church, Rev. A. R. Wallace, of the Eighth Presbyterian, and Rev. Geo. C. Needham, the evangelist, all staunch supporters of our reform. Mr. Needham, formerly its pastor, congratulated the Chicago Avenue Church members upon the spirit of aggressiveness shown in inviting the champion of anti-secrecy to occupy their platform with this important but unpopular topic.

—The bogus "papal encyclical," advocating the wholesale massacre of Protestants at the time of the Roman Catholic Congress here last September, which created so much general alarm, is given by the treasurer of the A. P. A. at Toledo, Ohio, as his excuse for his purchase of Winchester rifles for the use of the order. If, as alleged, the A. P. A. originated and endorsed that forged document, his excuse is very lame. As a member, he should have been better informed, and less of a laughing-stock than he is now.

—The "drawings" of the notorious Louisiana State Lottery are made in Honduras, but a Jacksonville (Fla.) paper reports that the principal offices and manufactory are at a little village in Florida, near Tampa, on the Gulf coast. There the tickets are made and from there they are sent by express to all parts of our country and the world. The only part of the business done in Honduras is the turning of the wheel. Only one man is kept at that place, whereas all the officers and operators are to be found in Florida. It is an ingenious evasion of United States law. A line of steamers runs between Tampa and Honduras.

—Rev. Kenelm Vaughan has arrived in New York City to establish a branch of the Archeon Fraternity of the Divine Expiation, a religious society which he founded in London six years ago and of which he is the head. In 1893 it was raised by the Pope to the rank of an archeon fraternity (whatever that is), and has for its protector Mario Cardinal Mocenni. It has a membership of over 100,000. Cui bono? Surely any Christian church should be a sufficient "fraternity" in itself, without these puzzling side-shows. One rightly grows suspicious of them and their influence in communities where their objects are either not known or known too well.

—The Independent fails to understand why Robert G. Ingersoll can go about the country lecturing against Christianity in the most obnoxious manner without molestation, while other itinerants who lecture against the holy "infallible" church of the seven hills are in danger of being mobbed almost anywhere. The Christian Conservator gives the reason thus:

The same reason exists here as for similar violence to the men who go about the country lecturing against the secret lodge system. They have something covered up which they don't want exposed and proclaimed from the housetop. Any institution in this country which cannot bear open investigation on the public rostrum is dangerous, and good citizens should be on their guard against it and heroically resist all its encroachments and its elevation to positions of power and influence.

—The Knights of Labor have given public notice that they intend to investigate the record of Chief Arthur of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. He is charged by them with the responsibility of the failure of all the strikes in which the Brotherhood was interested since 1884, or since their successful contest with the Union Pacific Railroad. As Mr. Arthur, according to their claim, is the possessor of property valued at $171,000 in Cleveland, Ohio, and has, besides, a quantity of railroad stocks, they are anxious to learn by what methods he has succeeded in making this accumulation of capital. Mr. Arthur was in Chicago last week, but refused to be interviewed as to his relations with the Knights.

secret orders. We want to know how more successfully to meet them.'

From J. G. Stauffer, Quakertown:—'God be with you and your work! The Lord cannot work with lodge-ridden ministers. I think the most dangerous secret society is the Jesuit order. They are very dangerous to the free institutions of our country.'

From Joel Swartz, Gettysburg:—'I wish and pray for a strong and successful convention and good work in behalf of our cause.'"

Tuesday Afternoon.—Devotional exercises, at 1:30, led by Rev. A. S. Shelly. Earnest prayer by several members for God's guidance and blessing.

The Committee on Resolutions reported. After some modifications and additions, the convention adopted the resolutions as follows:

THE RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas, We believe Freemasonry, so-called, the Society of Jesuits, and all societies which impose on their members an oath or other obligation to keep secret and obey a code of unknown laws and regulations, are unscriptural, un-American, and necessarily and essentially unfriendly to the church of Christ, and a threatening danger to free republican government; and

Whereas, We believe that membership in such societies implies the surrender of the elements of our nature which are essential to true manhood, and to that liberty of thought, action and conscience with which God has endowed and ennobled mankind; and

Whereas, Active membership in such societies breaks in upon the unity, sanctity, and sometimes the peace and harmony of the home; therefore,

Resolved, That we call upon the authorities of all Christian churches seriously to consider whether members of secret societies can be received into the membership of the church consistently with their allegiance to Christ; and that we call upon all members of the church of Christ who are members of secret societies, to "come out from among them and be separate," and "have no fellowship with the unfruitful works of darkness, but rather reprove them."

Resolved, further, That in view of their unrepublican character and their tendency to class and aristocracy, we call upon every true American to sever his or her connection with all such associations; and we appeal to the youth of this country, as they prize the real independence of their citizenship, and would cultivate and foster that patriotism which is the glory of the true American, not to have any connection with such societies.

Resolved, third, That in the light of recent events, in which is seen the possible power of secret societies to defeat justice and put in jeopardy the very government itself of the country, we implore the law-making powers of the States and the nation to revoke the charters of all such societies and grant no more such charters; and that all such societies be declared outlawed in this free republic.

Resolved, fourth, That we ask our legislative bodies, State and national, to declare, by enactment, that the transactions of all associations of whatever name shall be subject to investigation by the legally constituted authorities of the land.

Resolved, fifth, That the secretary of this convention be instructed to prepare a circular containing these resolutions, and send them to all religious newspapers of this country, with the request that they publish the same with comments. Signed by the Committee.

Miss Ella Carter gave a vocal selection, entitled, "The Model Church."

The next order was an open parliament, followed by short addresses, in which the defenders, as well as the opponents of secret societies, were given opportunity to speak. Several lodge people embraced the opportunity, and sought to defend the societies, conspicuous among these being George W. Marter, Esq., of the Philadelphia bar. On the other side, the contest was upheld by Dr. McAllister, Rev. J. P. Stoddard and others. Time ran short and several of those who had been asked to speak could not be heard from. On motion, Mr. Marter and Rev. T. S. Bennett, Eldred, Pa., were requested to write out their remarks, and that the Cynosure be requested to publish them as a part of the report of this meeting.

Tuesday Evening.—The spacious audience room of the church was filled by a large and attentive congregation. After an open service of prayer and a song by Miss Carter, these stirring addresses were delivered as follows:

1. The Lodge and the Liquor Traffic, by Mrs. A. E. Stoddard, Boston, Mass.; 2. The Incompatibility of an Intelligent Experimental Christianity, and an Active, Intelligent Membership of Freemasonry, by Rev. Dr. H. H. George, Washington, D. C.; 3. False Religion the Basis of all Evil, by Rev. David McAllister, D. D., Pittsburgh, Pa.

On motion, it was decided to request the publication of these three addresses and also of the paper by Josiah W. Leeds. The following closing resolutions were passed:

Resolved, That we extend a vote of thanks to the pastor and trustees of this church for the welcome and kind hospitality extended to us.

Resolved, second, That we express our gratitude to those city papers who fairly reported our proceedings, and to the lodge friends, who have courteously given us their views.

Resolved, third, That we thank the speakers and singers who, at personal sacrifice, have encouraged us by their presence and service.

The convention closed with prayer led by Rev. N. L. Heidger, and the benediction by the President.

WRITTEN FOR ME.

I was tired and weary of living,
So heavy had grown my load;
Rebellious, too, in my grieving,
No beauty around me glowed.

My heart ached nigh to breaking,
I chafed beneath the rod;
While doubt and grief were slowly taking
My faith away from God.

I was busy cleaning the pantry,
Too heavy laden to pray;
Not one ray of light could I see,
As I placed the dishes away.

When I picked up an old torn paper,
Yellow and dim with age,
I halted a moment from labor
To glance at the corner page.

And there I found a few verses
That touched my stubborn heart,
About trouble and life's reverses:
I felt the tear-drops start.

The writer had known earth's losses,
Had felt the touch of woe;
But she sang in the midst of crosses,
"Suffering makes me grow."

I read it over and over,
My load began to lift,
While a light that was like no other
Fell on me like a rift.

And I smiled serene at the baby
As she stood beside my knee,
Mentally thanking the lady
Who had written those words for me.

THE FARMER'S WIFE—A TOO COMMON STORY.

I can see her, a faded, haggard, sallow woman, tired from the weary rising in the dark winter mornings, to the crawling from the unfinished pile of mending to the cold room upstairs, at night. Her husband is kind to her; but he has his own work; and her back aches, she is dizzy and faint, and life grows a heavier load on her shoulders every day. She does not consider that her health is part of the home's capital; and she is sure that they cannot afford to hire help, behindhand as they are; they can't afford a doctor (who would ride ten miles and charge five dollars); but she remembers that the last time she was at church she heard one of the society speak of a patent medicine that helped her last spring, and she will send for the medicine. Or else she writes to the household paper (price 50 cents a year) which she takes, asking the editor's advice. What pathetic and suggestive things are the Correspondence columns in these humble journals! How the ineradicable womanly longing to be attractive comes out in queer prescriptions to prevent the hair falling out, to remove freckles, or to make over old gowns with small sleeves into the flamboyant style of the day; how the woman's heart peeps through its thin disguise in those pitiful letters describing lonely lives and love that the strong years conquer, and the daily jar and fret of disillusioned toil, and all the rest of the dismal story. I seem to see the broken woman, who was a joyous and ambitious girl, tugging ever more wearily at her Sisyphus stone of duties, growing more irritable, more complaining as strength and heart fail, until the day shall come when the tired mother will not creep downstairs. Then the neighbors will watch and nurse by turns, and the doctor, who might have helped years ago, will be called in to witness properly the end that he cannot avert.—From "The Farmer in the North," in the March Scribner's.

LET SELF ALONE.

Think as little as possible about any good in yourself; turn your eyes resolutely from any view of your acquirements, your influence, your plan, your success, your following—above all, speak as little as possible about yourself. The inordinateness of our self-love makes speech about ourselves like the putting of a lighted torch to the dry wood which has been laid in order for burning. Nothing but duty should open our lips upon this dangerous theme, except it be in humble confession of our sinfulness before God.

Again, be specially on the watch against those little tricks by which the vain man seeks to bring round the conversation to himself, and gain the praise or notice which his thirsty ears drink in so greedily. Even if praise comes unsought, it is well, while men are uttering it, to guard yourself by thinking of some secret cause for humbling yourself inwardly to God, thinking unto what these pleasant accents would be changed if all that is known to God, and even to yourself, stood revealed to man.

Place yourself often beneath the cross of Calvary; see that sight of love and sorrow; hear those words of wonder; look at the Eternal Son humbling himself there for you and ask yourself, as you gaze fixedly on him, whether he, whose only hope is in that cross of absolute self-sacrifice and self-abasement, can dare to cherish in himself one self-complacent action. Let the Master's words ring ever in your ears: "How can ye believe who receive honor one of another and seek not the honor that cometh from God only?"—Bishop Wilberforce.

BE CONTENT.

Be content with such things as ye have. Some people have better things; others have worse. You, perhaps, cannot have the better, and you have no desire for the worse; then be content with what you have. You may have had better things in the past, and you may have worse things in the future. Be thankful for the present, and be content. If your lot is a hard one, you may improve it, but not by murmuring, fretting or repining. Just here, to-day, learn the lesson of contentment, and wait on God for brighter days, for richer fruits, for purer joys.

No blessing comes to the murmuring, complaining, discontented heart. When once this evil demon of discontent has entered into the soul, nothing is right. Even the "angel's food" was not enough for the murmuring Israelites, and "the corn of heaven" could not satisfy those whose souls were filled with the discontent of earth. But where once the heart has found its rest in God, and all its murmurings are hushed in sweet submission to his will, there is peace in believing, and joy in the Holy Ghost, and a hallowed confidence in the kind providence of him who hath done all things well. "Let your conversation be without covetousness: and be content with such things as ye have; for he has said: I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. So that we may boldly say, the Lord is my helper and I will not fear what man shall do unto me."—The Christian.

WHERE IS YOUR BOY?

Every few months an epidemic of startling occurrences sweep from one ocean to the other. Suicides, murders, robberies, and brutal assaults seem to form the greater part of newspaper items, and to a person of refinement the daily paper becomes an almost disagreeable vistor instead of the bright, pleasant medium it is intended to be.

Trace these terrible happenings to their source, and invariably you will discover that the idea was first engendered by reading some of the cheap, trashy novels, where murders are considered an act of heroism and the murderer a hero. Brute force, rather than culture, is depicted as worthy of emulation, and the imaginatlon is excited, and the attention so centered upon the actors in the drama, the young reader is not given a chance to discriminate between the right and wrong features of the story.

Their sympathy is gained and the first strong fetter of parental love and home influence is lost. It is easier after this; they are not so easily shocked, and a book to be considered interesting must contain a murder or two, and have any number of strange ruffians handled by the hero of the novel with a dexterity not to be found in real life.

It is a sad sight to those who have followed up the cause and effect of the five-cent novel, to see them on sale in news-rooms, and attracting crowds of boys at the window.

A perverted taste is as easily cultivated as any other, and its effect is easily detected by the watchful eye.

Trashy books are always followed by a like companionship.

Insist upon your boy or your girl bringing their associates home. See with whom the hours are spent of whose import you can only guess.

Help protect the heart and mind from the influence of evil, by good literature and good companions.

No more true saying exists than that of "As the twig is bent, the tree inclines." Keep the little ones from the street; keep their minds filled with pure thoughts and high aspirations. Teach them to honor good and abhor evil, and the next generation will have less need for reformatories and prisons than this.

What we read wields a powerful influence over our minds—over our lives.

Find out what your children are reading. Find out what path they are treading, and in whose company.

Keep the sensational and coarse literature from them until they are old enough to judge it knowingly, and they will discard it of their own accord.

As long as we have faith to help us; as long as we are inspired with a reverence for what is good and noble, hope will not desert us and make suicide easy, or a murder anything but crime.

Brave, upright characters are always appreciated; nobleness and gentleness are inseparable; teach your children this fact early, and their youth will be a blessing, their man and womanhood a crown of glory to you into whose hands the innocent soul was given.—The Humane Journal.

THE SOFT ANSWER.

"What a blessed thing it would be if more people understood the true significance of the expression, 'a soft answer turneth away wrath,'" said an elderly woman of wide experience, as she left a house noted for its disagreements, bickerings and continual family jars. "How I wish that I had the power to impress upon those people the advantage, the actual physical and mental benefit, to say nothing of the moral phase, of that passage of Holy Writ. I have been five days in that house, and I do not think it is the least exaggeration to say I have heard five times five pert responses, insolent contradictions, unfeeling criticisms on what was done with good intentions, and disagreeable, almost brutal nagging about things that no one could help. It is truly a weariness to the flesh, and the worst of it all is, those people do not seem to understand that there is any other way to do or that they are in the least at fault themselves; each one lays the whole of the blame to the other, and feels personally aggrieved that all this wrangling is continually going on. The father and mother rarely agree on any subject, the brothers quarrel with the sisters as a regular thing and on general principles, while the girls are constantly nagging and contending among themselves. How the boys act when they are out of the house I am sure I can't imagine, but when they are at home they rarely address each other, except to say something annoying. I get so tired of it that I seem sometimes scarcely able to bear it, but they are very dear friends of mine, and I put up with it the best I can. If I say a word, there is such deep regret expressed at the situation and such total blindness is evident on the part of the one I am addressing, that I give up in despair.

"The other day, I said something to one of the boys about teasing his younger sister, which he had been doing in a most aggravating way, but he set out with such a series of arguments to prove that he was right and she was wrong, that I was glad to quit the subject and introduce some topic more profitable as well as more agreeable.

"Truly a soft answer turneth away wrath, and it would be well if all families appreciated the fact, but this text should be taught in connection with the one about the beam in one's own eye. To expect somebody else always to do the soft answering, is to demand of human nature that which is almost an impossibility."—N. Y. Ledger.

DAN—A TRUE STORY.

The faithful few were in their accustomed places, and had sung a Psalm at the opening of the Wednesday night prayer-meeting in a small Western town.

A mother and son entered. A weary schoolteacher who, week after week, left her care for the hour's refreshment, became interested in this pair. On inquiring she learned that they were very poor and were from the lowest class in town. The husband and father drank and so abused the children that they had separated, and the wife, while taking in washing and trying to support four children, was very ignorant and harsh to them. This son of sixteen did not know all of the letters of the alphabet.

For twenty weeks this teacher and her friend embraced an opportunity of teaching this boy Dan.

They met him in the church an hour before service on Wednesdays, and taught him to read and write; then in Sabbath-school she taught him the plan of salvation, had him read in the New Testament and commit the Ten Commandments. Rather slow at grasping a thought, he might be called a dull pupil, but he never seemed to forget what he had once learned; so the days went by till Dan wandered off to look for work. Summer had come, and his teacher was enjoying a rest at her father's farm when, one evening, Dan walked in, looking for work. Dan had recited the Ninth Commandment and would say, "I don't steal nor swear any more, but I do lie." He had committed all the Bible verses relating to this sin, but at the end of reciting them he still said, "I can't help lying." He had both smoked and chewed tobacco when he first began to study, and his teacher told him good reasons for giving up the habit, but Dan said: "No use trying." The next Sabbath, however, he appeared elated and said: "Well, I've stopped tobacco; I had bought some yesterday and was walking home when I stopped and said, 'There, she's taking her time for nothing to teach me, and this is all she asks of me; so I'll quit.' I threw it into the river, but it's awful hard." "Pray, Dan, and do it for Christ's sake; then you will succeed," was the reply; and many prayers were offered that Dan might gain the victory.

Two weeks later his mother, coming out of church, said: "Pray for me, for Dan is so cross since he gave up tobacco;" but Dan was victorious, and his mother was repaid by getting his tobacco money in flour.

The farmer engaged him to work for a month, as Dan claimed to be familiar with all kinds of farm work; but he was a sore trial to his industrious, truthful employer. He told the most unreal stories, and, when reasoned with about them, he always increased their size. He never was incommoded, whether he had upset a load of hay by bad building, or let a horse run off. In the evening he would bring his Bible to his teacher, read his verses (often astonishing her by his explanation of them), but his old habit of changing came over him and he was off to another job. Thus he rambled, always reporting his new places, but seldom waiting long enough to get a reply.

When Valentine day came, his teacher received a large valentine, with Dan's name in large letters on the back, and soon after a letter, stating that he was going to take her advice and stay at his work this time. He was learning to paint; but she had lost faith in him, not even praying frequently for him, but the Heavenly Shepherd was more watchful, and after two years this word reached her: Poor Dan has finished his course. He had learned his trade and was doing some work for one of our members. He had improved greatly. He took blood poison and was delirious for nearly two weeks. His pastor visited him, his mother went to him, helping to care for him; Just before he departed he became conscious and knew them. To his mother he said: "Be kind to everyone and do all you can for Jesus, who died to save you." He then knocked on the table by his bed and said: "Seek and ye shall find; knock and it shall be opened unto you." "I see heaven's gates opened and I am entering in;" then passed, we trust, from a life of wandering and weakness, pardoned and perfected by his Saviour, to one of rest.—Christian Nation.

A CHANCE FOR HEROISM

"Oh, dear," said Willie Gray, as he set down the saw-block and looked on the kindling which he ought to have been splitting for his mother, "I do wish I could do something for the world; some great action that everyone could admire, that would make the whole country and the whole world better and happier. I wish I could be a hero like Washington, or a famous missionary like Judson, but I can't do anything or be anything."

"Why do you want to be a hero?" asked his cousin, Mary Maynard, who, coming up just then, happened to overhear his soliloquy.

"Oh," said Willie, coloring, "every one admires a hero, and talks about him, and praises him after he is dead."

"That's the idea of it, is it?" said Polly. "You want to be a hero for the sake of being talked about."

Willie did not like this way of putting it.

"Not only that, but I want to do good to people—do something worth doing."

"That sounds better; but believe me, Willie, the greatest heroes have been men who thought least about themselves and more about their work; and, so far as I can recollect now, the great—I mean according to the Christian standard—have always begun by doing the duty nearest to them, however small."

Here he took up the axe and began to split the kindling wood; and when that was done he set to work to pick up the sticks without a word; but though he said nothing he thought the more.

"I've wasted lots of time thinking what great things I might do if I only had the chance," he thought, "and I've neglected the thing I could and ought to do, and made a lot of trouble for mother. I guess I'd better begin my heroism by fighting my own laziness."—Exchange.

SPEAK KINDLY.

Speak kindly, for our days are all too few
For any angry strife;
There is deep meaning, if we only knew,
In our brief life.
No nobler mission can be ours, if we
A pang can stay;
Or if amidst the rush of tears we see,
Wipe one away.

Speak kindly. Gracious words, God sent, God given,
Are never lost;
They come all fragrant with the breath of heaven,
Yet nothing cost.
Kind words are like kind acts: they steal along
Life's hidden springs;
Then in the darkest storms some little song
The sad heart sings.

Speak kindly, graciously, for all around
Are pains and smarts;
The very air is full of moans and sound
Of breaking hearts.
Seek, seek to bind them up as once did He,
Thy gracious Lord;
Then surely will his hand bestow on thee
A bright reward.

TEMPERANCE.

AN EVENING IN A LONDON GIN PALACE.

Several men, mostly young, and in shirt-sleeves, for it was hot within that reeking place, were serving behind the counter. It was the first time Arthur Danesbury had ever been inside of a London gin-shop, and he stood in amazement. Lustrous mirrors in glittering gilt frames dazzled his sight, their costly plate-glass reflecting back the lights as in countless numbers; massive pillars, all marble and burnished gold—at any rate to look at; showy time-pieces and rich cut-glass chandeliers. Could this be a common gin-shop where penny half-pints of porter and drams of gin were doled out? Ay, it was, indeed, and a luminous sight it was. The taps communicating with the spirit casks were of polished silver, or were silver-plated—it was impossible for the eye to tell which; farther on, a little space, were the beer-taps; and the beautiful shelves behind held bottles of various kinds and elegant ornament. They contained cordials and liquors whose very names were sufficient to tempt the unwary, as they gazed at them, ranged there before the plate-glass. No lack of good cheer was sold there, or what the infatuated crowd deemed such. Barclay, Perkins & Co.'s entire, prime double-stout, mild ale, best cordial gin, cream of the valley, "Old Tom," pineapple rum, genuine Scotch whisky, best French brandy, sherbet, rum-shrub, were some of the names that, amidst many others, stared in Arthur's eyes. A little recovering from his astonishment, he approached a portly man who appeared to be the master. The latter gazed at him with surprise. His lofty form, his better than lofty countenance, his high breeding and affable tones were such as had not often been seen at the Golden Eagle.

Arthur courteously raised his hat (yes, even to a tavern-keeper, for he was a thorough gentleman at heart) and spoke in a low tone as he bent over the counter.

"Will you allow me the privilege of waiting here for half an hour? I wish to see a friend who occasionally comes here; perhaps he may do so to-night."

"Sir, with pleasure," respectfully answered the landlord. "Will you please walk into our private parlor, sir?"

"Thank you, no. This gentleman may be in and gone in a minute, and I might miss him. I will stand aside and wait here."

The landlord bustled forward with a chair, and placed it at the corner of the counter. Arthur moved it back into the shade (if that term may be applied to any place so brilliant with light), somewhat out of the reach, and somewhat out of the gaze of the crowd. The landlord handed him a weekly newspaper, and he opened it, but his attention was much taken up by what was passing around him.

They were coming in, thick and three-fold, men, women, boys, girls—some old, some young; some "respectable," some the very dregs of the street. If ever Arthur Danesbury felt pre-eminently thankful for being a water-drinker, he felt so then. Repelling jokes met his ear, coarse conversation, profane swearing. Some were haggard with famine; some, with long drinking; some were scarcely a day removed from their graves. One woman, pale and bloated, in a broken straw bonnet, came up to the counter carrying a moaning infant. It did not seem to have strength to cry.

"Quartern o' prime Old Tom," she cried, putting down fivepence.

No sooner said than the glass was handed to her with one hand and the money swept away with the other. She drank it, rather better than three parts, and the rest she poured down the throat of the infant, to dose it into quietness. Arthur Danesbury could not forbear an exclamation, but it was unheard in that babel of sounds. As the woman turned from the counter, a young girl, in a green-and-red plaid shawl and tidy cotton gown, pushed her way into the place. She looked scarcely seventeen, yet the plague-spot of intemperance had already set its mark upon her face. Thin and wan, and clammy in flesh and feature, she had the lack-lustre eye, and the hot red lips. She fixed those poor eyes of hers upon the landlord and spoke with a pleading accent.

"Master, you'll just trust me with a half-quartern, won't ye?"

"Not if I know it, wench," roughly replied the same tongue which had been so civil to Arthur Danesbury.

"I'm dying for it," she went on. "I hain't had a taste in my lips this day, and I'm just fainting for the want of it. He ain't come out o' quod yet; when he does, I'll pay ye. Let's have it."

"Just take yourself off," returned the landlord; "you can't come the dodge over me."

She broke out into an oath. "Hear to him!" she shrilly cried, turning to the shopful. "He won't trust for a paltry half-quartern, and we have laid out pounds with him. You avaricious old Brimstone! I know who'll get his own some day."

The landlord did not reply. He nodded to two of his men in their shirt-sleeves, who emerged from behind the counter and bundled the unhappy girl outside, she shrieking and cursing.

"We have rough customers here sometimes, sir," said the landlord, approaching Arthur, and speaking in a tone of apology; "and this is Saturday night; any other it would not be so bad."

"Poor things!" returned Arthur Danesbury.

"Can I offer you a glass of anything, sir? I'm sure I should be proud to—if you'd please to name what. I have got as good a glass of port as ever was tasted."

Arthur shook his head. "You are very kind. I never drink."

"Never, sir! Not anything!"

"Except water."

"Law, sir! that's poor stuff to keep up a man's stamina."

"I don't know," returned Arthur with an amused look. "If you contrast my stamina with that of those I now see around, I think mine would not suffer in the comparison."

"Yes, sir," said the landlord; "but you must also contrast your position and advantages with theirs."

"It may be that some of those now present have had it in their power to attain to as good a position as mine," returned Arthur. "Two or three of them look as though they had been gentlemen once."

"Yes, I believe they have been, sir."

"Till ruined by the demon, drink," muttered Arthur to himself.

"Who is that sitting down in the bar?" demanded the smartly-attired landlady, when her husband went into their own parlor.

"I don't know who; some nob, though. He's a real gentleman, whoever he may be; a lord, I shouldn't wonder. He took off his hat to me as stylish as if I had been a duke royal, and asked leave to wait to see a friend. But, I say, what d'ye think? He's one of them teetotallers."

"How do you know?"

"Because he said so. I asked him to take something (I'd have given one of my best beeswing ports to such a man as he, for that he was not one of the beer or gin customers I could see with half an eye) and he said he never took anything but water."

"Perhaps he is one of those teetotal spies, come to show the trade up," suggested the landlady.

"No, that he is not. He has nothing of the spy about him. He carries the stamp of honor on his face. My belief is, he is a noble incog."

"What made you give him that newspaper to read?"

"Because I thought he might like to amuse himself with it while he waited."

"But that's an old one."

"An old one!" cried the landlord. "Ain't it to-night's?"

"No, last week's. Here's to-night's."

"Bless me," exclaimed the man. And taking the fresh paper, damp from the press, he approached Arthur with an apology for his remissness. The latter took it, but did not at the moment resign the other, for he was interested in something he was reading from it. Just then there was a loud shout in the bar, causing Arthur to look up, and the landlord to step close to the counter. It seemed to speak of applause.

The young girl had come in again, and flinging down a shilling on the counter, demanded a half-quartern of "mountain dew." The gin was served out to her and the eightpence change. She had taken off her cotton gown in the street, and pledged it for a shilling at the opposite pawnshop.—Danesbury House.

BIBLE LESSON.

A STUDY OF INTEMPERANCE BY SOLOMON.

LESSON XI.—First Quarter, 1894.—March 18.

SUBJECT.—Wine is a Mocker.—Prov. 20: 1-7.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging: and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.—Prov. 20: 1.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Wine is a mocker. V. 1. To mock another is to make him the subject of derision or ridicule, by leading him to believe what is not true, or deluding him by false promises. Wine and alcoholic liquors of every kind do exactly this. They mock the drinker. The old Greeks used to make a slave drunk, sometimes, as an object-lesson to the children to deter them from the vice. Alcohol is a brain-poison. It acts on other parts of the body, but its most deadly mischief is wrought on that organ which thinks and reasons. It mocks its victims in many ways: 1. By distorting their mental vision, so that they see themselves and every one else in a false light. They sing maudlin songs, and try to make witty remarks that are only coarse and silly; but they are unaware that they sing only discords and talk only nonsense. 2. By leading him into such ridiculous situations that he becomes the sport of boys and unthinking people who do not see the pitiableness of it. 3. By promises that it never fulfills. A passing moment of sensual gratification is all the drunkard gets to counterbalance headache and remorse. "At the last it biteth like a serpent;" he loses property, reputation, friends, and perhaps dies in the horrible agonies of delirium tremens. "Strong drink is raging." Ninety per cent of the fearful crimes recorded in every daily paper we take up are the result of alcoholism. It converts a man naturally good-tempered into an unreasoning, furious brute. "He that is deceived thereby"—who imagines that he can drink moderately and stop when he wants to—"is not wise," for he has had plenty of warning. He goes into the snare with his eyes open. Fifty years ago the evil effects of alcohol had not been scientifically demonstrated; there was little temperance literature, and therefore more excuse for contracting the drink-habit. One of the saddest results of alcoholism is that it takes from a man his mental and moral sovereignty, so that he can no longer control his own actions. He "is not wise" who goes into places or among associates who will tempt him to drink. This is one of the many reasons why young men should keep out of the lodges, which are so often only secret smoking and drinking clubs, the allies and bulwark of the saloon.

2. Two characteristics of folly. Vs. 3, 4. "It is an honor for a man to cease from strife." This is in distinct opposition to the duelist's "code of honor." The folly of dueling is now very generally acknowledged in most civilized communities, but much of the old feeling from which it sprang still lingers. To withdraw from a quarrel and give a rival all the advantage, as Abraham did Lot, is apt to brand a man as a "milk-sop" and a "coward;" when to do so is in reality to exercise the greatest heroism, the truest bravery. We have here the word of the wisest of men and monarchs that it is a mark of honor, a sign of true nobility of character, to "cease from strife." "The sluggard will not plow by reason of the cold." Yet the plowing-time in Palestine was in the most comfortable season of the year, just on the borders of winter. A lazy person is always ready to offer the smallest excuse as a reason for shirking. He that will not plow cannot expect to reap, and in time of harvest he must beg of his more industrious neighbors. So of him who neglects his soul's salvation; or, being a nominal Christian, refuses through indolence to do any work in his Lord's vineyard. They who "come with rejoicing, bearing their sheaves with them," are they who have "sowed in tears," who have allowed no considerations of personal ease or comfort to stand in the way when duty called them. The spiritual sluggard may try to excuse his sloth, but when he stands before his Judge empty-handed such excuses will avail little.

3. Characteristics of true wisdom. Vs. 5–7. There is a familiar proverb, that "truth is found at the bottom of a well." So the profoundest wisdom never lies on the surface. The men who know the most about the deep things of life and religion are not the ones most anxious to display their knowledge; and therefore "a man of understanding will draw it out." This does not apply entirely to men of great learning. We can learn something from every one—even those engaged in the most humble occupations, by drawing them out to tell us what they know most about. Most of all should we be eager to learn from Christians who have had a long and varied experience, and have solved many problems in their individual lives which perplex the young disciple. In the lowliest situations in life we shall find those who have drank so deeply of divine wisdom that they could teach many learned college professors or even popular ministers. But as a rule they are not conscious of their own spiritual measure. A man of faith and prayer will not "proclaim his own goodness." People who count themselves perfect seldom bear that reputation among their neighbors. "A just man walketh in his integrity." His life is consistent, and the blessing of his example extends to his children after him.

LITERATURE.

From the Ball-room to Hell. By T. A. Faulkner, Ex-Dancing-master; Formerly Proprietor of the Los Angeles Dancing Academy and Ex-President of the Dancing Masters' Association of the Pacific Coast. Pages 72. Chicago: The Henry Publishing Co., 57 Washington street, Room 46. Price, in paper, 25 cents.

The author of this pamphlet is an expert—a professional and observant master of the "art" of dancing. Converted to God, and seeing the sin of his profession in the light of Gospel truth, he cast it from him as an unholy, loathsome thing. To repair in some degree, if possible, the wickedness into which he had been himself led, and into which he had led others by his instructions, he has given to parents, in plain, unmistakable language, these words of solemn warning. On every page he condemns with Christian earnestness and pathos, and with a burdened sense of duty, the evils of the social dance. Nor does he speak in vain. Ten leading clergymen of Los Angeles—Methodist, Baptist, United Presbyterian, Lutheran, Disciple, Congregationalist, Universalist and Roman Catholic—give his testimony their unqualified approval. B. Fay Mills, the evangelist, writes to the author: "I believe what you say is true. I know of such cases as you have described. It should be read by all Christians." It is a terrible picture of civilized depravity, and one, we believe, that is not overdrawn.

The Higher Criticism. By H. L. Hastings. Part I. Boston: H. L. Hastings, 47 Cornhill. Pages 36. Paper, 10 cents.

This is the introduction to an extended treatise on a subject which is attracting all the attention that it deserves, and one that places its advocates on the verge of infidelity.

The basis of the Christian religion is faith. The promoter of faith is revelation. "Faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the Word of God." (Rom. 10: 17.) Whatever, therefore, tends to destroy faith in the Word of God is in opposition to him. Hence, it is plainly wickedness and rebellion to attempt to cast doubts upon its truth and power; for Paul tells us that "it is the power of God unto salvation!" Mr. Hastings proceeds to review some of the many attempts of infidels and skeptics to disparage the Scriptures, and to justly hold up to obloquy the weakness and narrowness of these self-reliant critics. It seems to us that any man who in his heart desires to honor God and obey him will soonest find out the truth of the Bible by earnestly asking the Holy Spirit to help him believe all that he ought to believe, and to cast all else aside. The man who prays in that spirit will have no quarrel with the Bible as it is. This is our personal experience.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The March issue of St. Nicholas deals quite extensively and intelligently with topics of interest in the real world as well as the usual fanciful creations of pen and pencil which insure its popularity among the children. The principal of these are: Owner of the Mail-bags, by M. I. Ingersoll; Joseph Boruwlaski, the famous dwarf, by Mary S. Roberts; The Cat Family in our Country, by W. T. Hornaday; A Man-of-War's Menagerie, by Don C. Seitz; A Kansas Cyclone, by Jno. M. Steele (finely illustrated); A Boy-Whaler, by Gustave Kobbe; A Lesson in Electricity, by Philip Atkinson, and The Needle in the Hay Stack, by Lee Carter. Tom Sawyer Abroad, by Mark Twain; Toinette's Philip, by Mrs. Jamieson, and Recollections of the Wild Life, by Dr. Chas. A. Eastman, are each continued. These and the several editorial departments, with numerous sketches, jingles, many fine engravings, etc., make up a varied and attractive number. New York: The Century Co., Union Square. Price, 25 cents.

Distinctive features of special interest in Scribner's Magazine for March are found in The Sea-Island Hurricanes (second paper)—The Relief—by Joel Chandler Harris, copiously illustrated; The High Building and its Art, by Barr Ferree, illustrated; Milton Visiting Galileo—A Painting by Tito Lessi, by Philip G. Hamerton, with full-page illustration and portrait of Lessi; The Farmer in the North (sketches of American Types, illustrated), by Octave Thanet; On Piratical Seas—A Merchant's Voyage to the West Indies in 1805, by Peter A. Grotjan; Sub-Tropical Florida, by Chas. R. Dodge, illustrated, and The Cable Street Railway—How it is Built, by Philip G. Hubert, Jr. Other papers include the beginning of A Pound of Cure, A Story of Monte Carlo, by Wm. H. Bishop; Life and Love, by Melville Upton; The Summer Intimacy, by Geo. A. Hibbard, and new chapters of John March, Southerner, by Geo. W. Cable, with editorial notes, etc. New York: Chas. Scribner's sons. Price, 25 cents.

Historia for 1894—an illustrated monthly magazine of historical stories—begins the year with marked improvements and new inducements for subscribers. In its contents it has always maintained unique interest, and loses nothing in this respect, if the January and February issues are any criterion for judging of future numbers. Real adventures occurring in the histories of all countries form its staple material, and in these the wildest dreams of romance are frequently surpassed. In a family of youths it will be found an incentive to read larger histories and an excellent substitute for "yellow-covered novels." Published by the Historia Company, 20 Times Building, Chicago. Price, 10 cents.

The Humane Journal, edited and published by Albert W. Landon, 560 Wabash avenue, Chicago, at $1.00 a year, is one of the best periodicals that can be taken and read in any family of growing children. Bright and attractive in its contents and illustrations, it teaches grand lessons of humanity that are everywhere demanded by the brutal usages that pervade all classes of society.

ATHLETICS FOR CHILDREN.

The advantages of gymnasium practice for young children, and its direct bearing on their future, can hardly be reckoned, writes Ellen La Garde in the Ladies' Home Journal. Strange to say, the most common defect in the physical status of children is a most grievous one, namely, lateral curvature of the spine. The majority of curvature cases occur between the ages of five and fourteen, and need not happen at all if the matter is properly understood and attended to. These tender little bodies will bend and permanently shape, like young plants, in whatever way their growth is directed. If your child is carelessly permitted to assume one position for any lengthened period, you may expect, as a result, a one-sided development. If, by more frequent use, either side is put to greater action than the other, it will become so much stronger that all muscular movements will be performed from it, and it will, in time, obtain complete mastery over the deficient development, the latter finally being rendered unable to perform its natural functions. From it hip disease, as well as curvature of the spine, results. The proverbial ounce of prevention is always better than the pound of cure, particularly in this case.

TO MAKE GOOD COFFEE.

A coffee-pot which filters is best, if one is inexperienced in that art; but the old black Maryland cook can make the beverage in a plain, common pot, and have it excellent. She puts the ground coffee in the pot, and shakes it about on the stove until thoroughly heated, and then pours on the boiling water. In this way the heated ground coffee imparts to the fluid an extra pungency of flavor and richness.—Selected.

Everything connected with Butter

—churns, patters, tubs, firkins—ought to be washed with Pearline. That gets at the soaked-in grease as nothing else in the world can. Things may seem to be clean when you've washed them in the usual way; but use Pearline, and they really are clean. It might make all the difference, sometimes, between good butter and bad. Wherever you want thorough cleanliness, or want to save your labor, the best thing to do is to use Pearline.

Send it Back Peddlers and some unscrupulous grocers will tell you "this is as good as" or "the same as Pearline." IT'S FALSE—Pearline is never peddled, and if your grocer sends you something in place of Pearline, be honest—send it back. 383 JAMES PYLE, New York.

Talks to Sunday School Teachers.
By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth..... .75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.
S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Telescope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill.

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches with an earnestness born of conviction.

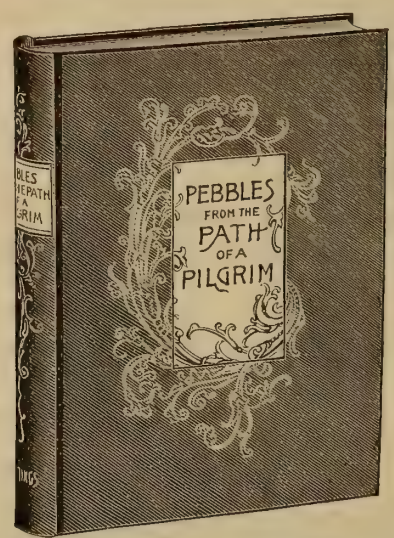
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book.... No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT of the Holy Ghost,

BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire; 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by perusing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polemical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

FARM NOTES.

It would probably increase most of our garden crops if the land should be well rolled before putting in the seed. This is known to be a matter of importance with grain crops, and it would work equally well in the garden. It is true that packing the ground down solidly when wet would lessen the crop, but when it is too wet to bear the rolling it is also too wet to plant. It should be dried either by draining or by stirring the surface until the moisture has evaporated. The clod-crusher, or a good stone boat driven over the field, may do as a substitute for the roller, but it is not as easy on the horses.

In pitting potatoes or other roots a place not likely to be flooded nor saturated by stagnant water should be chosen. It need not be on very high ground, but a trench 10 or 12 inches deep should be dug around the pit and lower than it. On the other lower side of this trench it should have an outlet, so that water cannot stand in it. It is better to have a dry place for the pit, although such soil freezes deeper than that which is filled with water.

There need be no fear of making the soil around large trees in full bearing too rich. If young orchards are fertilized or cultivated too highly they will run to wood, but in older trees this extra supply of nutriment will, if the tree be properly pruned, be turned to the production of a richer and better flavored fruit than the larger specimens which very young trees occasionally produce.

Milk powder or solidified milk promises to become a standard dairy product. This will help to extend the range and profit of the dairy industry, as the business of condensing milk has already done. —Selected.

FIVE FAMOUS ETCHINGS.

The Passenger Department of the New York Central has just issued a series of five beautiful etchings, which artistically outrank anything of the kind ever issued by any railroad company, while the absence of any advertising feature renders them suitable for hanging in your office, library or home.

A brief description of each, with a glance at their titles, is all that is necessary to obtain a fair idea of the pictures.

No. 1 is "Washington Bridge," which spans the Harlem river at 181st street—one of the finest bridges in the world, and a marvel of engineering. In the distance is Highbridge, the Croton Viaduct. In the foreground a characteristic river scene, that will be recognized by any one at all familiar with the locality.

No. 2—"Rock of Ages, Niagara Falls," from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A view that has been admired by every one who has seen it. The soft tones in which it is printed add greatly to the effect of falling waters and spray.

No. 3—"Old Spring at West Point," also from a photo by William H. Jackson & Co., Denver. A romantic scene, recalling memories of summer days at the famous military academy.

No. 4—"999 and the DeWitt Clinton." The Famous Empire State Express Engine "999" which occasioned such widespread comment at the World's Fair, occupies the top half of the card, and below appears the old "DeWitt Clinton," affording a truly remarkable example of the progress of railroad science in the past fifty years.

No. 5—"Rounding The Nose, Mohawk Valley." One of the handsomest railroad pictures ever made. The scene is just below Little Falls.

These etchings are all printed on fine plate paper, 24x32 inches, suitable for framing. Copies of either of them can be procured at the office of W. B. Jerome, 97 Clark St., Chicago, for fifty cents, or will be mailed in a stiff tube, secure from injury, to any address, postpaid, for seventy-five cents, in currency, stamps, express or postal money order, upon application to Geo. H. Daniels, General Passenger Agent, Grand Central Station, New York.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun 'orgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' said 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. .... The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

WISCONSIN STATE CONVENTION.

The Wisconsin Christian Association, opposed to secret societies, will convene in Oshkosh, on the C. and N. W. R R, on the 27th and 28th inst.

There will be four sessions, beginning on Tuesday evening (27th), and continuing through the following day.

Ths official call was not received in time for this issue, but will be found in the Cynosure of next week.

Write to your State officers for their encouragement and for the best interests of the cause. Your State treasurer will need your co-operation. His address is Mr. J. W. Wood, Baraboo, Wis. The address of the president is Rev. J. B. Galloway, Poynette, Wis. Write to them.

The crowded state of our columns obliges us to leave over several interesting items.

The closing lecture of Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard's course on secret societies, delivered at Chicago avenue (Moody's) church, on the evening of March 5, was well-attended, notwithstanding the severe rainstorm which prevailed, and the evening was one of enjoyment. Rev. Edgar B. Wylie, pastor of Summerdale Congregational church, presided. Many of the members of the church were present, and one who heard the President give his explanation of the obligations and religious character of the oath-bound fraternities with his usual earnestness and eloquence was led to remark: "It seems to me as if the people listen to these truths with a keener relish than I have previously observed."

Members of a newly organized "Christian Citizenship Committee," composed of residents, last week held numerous meetings at churches in this city, with able speakers, urging voters to do their duty as citizens, to take an active part in politics, to attend primaries, to go to the polls and work industriously, endeavoring to see that public offices are filled with honest, competent men, regardless of party affiliations. This movement was originated by Francis E. Clarke, the founder of the Christian Endeavor societies, and is not confined to Chicago. Kansas City, Omaha and Trenton, N. J., already have organizations, but not in such pretentious form as Chicago. Edwin D. Wheelock has been the active leader in pushing the work in Chicago.

On the 8th inst., at Dallas, Texas, L. W. Hile, editor of the American Eagle, the organ of the A. P. A., printed at Kansas City, and organizer of A. P. A. lodges, attempted to lecture in the City Hall. To the 400 persons present he was explaining the tactics of the Jesuits and the Roman Catholic church, when he was attacked by a drunken saloon keeper, who drew his revolver with a yell and fired four shots. Hile was not hit, but two men in the audience were severely wounded. After being disarmed, the saloonkeeper contrived to escape. Hile resumed his lecture, after the fracas was over, and afterwards organized three lodges of the A. P. A. The press dispatch reports strong partisan feeling on both sides in the community. These attacks on free speech will tend to strengthen the A. P. A., since they are instigated only by the Roman Catholics.

The Attorney General of Illinois recently asked for the appointment of a receiver for the Masonic Benevolent Association of Central Illinois, which is virtually insolvent. It began business in Mattoon in 1874. In 1885 and 1886 its membership was more than five thousand. In its entire existence somewhat over two millions of dollars has been paid out in death losses, in policies ranging from $1,000 to $7,500. Within the last twelve months and more its star has been steadily on the decline. At the annual meeting of the board of directors held January 10, 1894, the report of Secretary Hooper showed there was $8,438.66 in the treasury, and death losses unpaid to the amount of $107,000. The receiver will have only this amount and whatever their building is worth, something over $6,000, to pay pro rata the death losses. No dereliction is charged against the officers, except that of not making the assessments sufficiently large to pay losses. The attorney general says it simply met the fate that must sooner or later overtake all such associations. The time must come to all of them when the losses will exceed the ability of the membership to pay.

One of the churches at Tabor, Iowa, has started an "endowment" scheme of its own. Each member of the church is invited to contribute fifty cents per month to a "Benefit Fund," and those who comply are entitled to the following benefits: (1) Regular sanitary inspection of their homes. (2) Free medical and surgical attendance in case of sickness or accident. (3) Three dollars a week while disabled. (4) A traveling certificate equivalent to a letter of credit, in case of need. (5) Free burial in case of death. Provision is made for extension of these benefits to the other members of a family if one of them is a member of the church, and for the care of young children and orphans. Members six months in arrears lose all claim on the fund, as well as the right to vote on any question regarding it. Free medical attendance and the disability allowance are made conditional upon compliance with the advice of the sanitary inspector. The fund is in the hands of the church treasurer, and is subject to the order of the "benefit committee," of which the pastor is chairman, ex-officio, without a vote. All questions regarding benefits are decided by this committee without appeal, but the committee itself is responsible to the church, to which it must report in full, quarterly. In the earliest Christian church they had a better plan than this. Read Acts 2: 43–47, and Acts 4: 31–37. Chapter 6: 1–4, also, has some reference to the "endowment plan" of the apostles. But then there was more spirituality and Christian love, and less "business," in the apostolic church. Times have changed.

The Chicago Times, with much good sense, is sarcastic over the Coughlin acquittal. By its verdict of "not guilty," (says the Times), "know all men that Daniel Coughlin was in no way concerned in the murder of Patrick Cronin five years ago next May; that he has for nearly the same period been deprived of his liberty, unjustly held up to public obloquy as a murderer without cause, and wantonly forced to spend of his own and his friends' substance a small fortune; that the array of witnesses summoned by the State, at even greater cost, are perjurers or fools, or both; that the jury who sat in the former trial were no better, and that the State's attorney's office of Cook county is an engine for persecuting an innocent man. . . . . He did not entice Dr. Cronin to his death or join the orgy of assassination in the Carlson cottage. Who says assassination and death? Was Dr. Cronin ever killed? Did he not, rather, as the experts declared, perish of a destroying kidney complaint and then crawl into the Lake View manhole, pulling the cover down over his body? Was there ever such a man as Dr. Cronin, anyway? And does the night of May 4, 1889, show on the calendar? The Clan-na-Gael, Camp 20, the triangle—are these realities or only the floating phantasmagoria of a dream?" What a farce is our boasted jury system becoming!

INTELLIGENT FREEMASONS ARE NOT TRUE CHRISTIANS.

[An address by Rev. H. H. George, D.D., of Washington, D. C., at the Pennsylvania State Anti-secrecy Convention, Philadelphia, February 27, 1894, under the title of "Incompatibility of an Intelligent, Experimental Christianity and an Active, Intelligent Membership of Freemasonry." It was ordered printed in the Cynosure.]

No man can be at the same time an intelligent, experimental Christian, and an active, intelligent Mason. The two experiences are in two worlds, and their distance apart is infinity. In the case that any one tries such an experiment, it can only be either that his intelligence is limited, or his conscience is weak, and the more charitable conclusion in the most of cases is, that he knows not what he is doing. Let us look a little at his predicament.

1. He is philosophically at war with himself. In the one system he reaches out his arms wide enough to embrace the distant Chinese, the wild Arab, and American savage, in fellowship; in the other system he holds communion with God and Christ, and Christ-loving people. Jesus Christ, with mercy infinite to lost men, cannot take into his bosom Arab and savage while they remain Arab and savage. He says: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts; then he will abundantly pardon."

The philosophy of Masonry antagonizes the philosophy of Christianity; it builds on a different basis. It fellowships what Christ cannot fellowship. Who is the wild Arab, or what sort of a character is the American savage? He may be a murderer, a thief, a robber, an idolater. He may be steeped in all the filth and crime of beastly existence. Can Jesus Christ have fellowship with him while he is such an Arab or savage? And if he cannot, can he have any part with any system that does fellowship such? "What concord hath Christ with Belial?" And if Christ has no fellowship with them, how can the Rev. Dr. Jones who preaches Christ have it?

Dr. Jones at once replies: "Masonry is not a religion; it was not designed to be a religion; it is a society for benevolence, to cultivate good fellowship, etc." And here he discovers his lack of intelligence. Masonry is a religion, was intended to be, expressly said to be by its ablest expositors; e. g., Albert Mackey says: "All the ceremonies of our order are prefaced and terminated with prayer, because Masonry is a religious institution, and because we thereby show our dependence on, and our faith and trust in God?" Can religion do anything more than show our dependence on, and our faith and trust in God? But it makes constant use of the Bible, or rather a Bible; it prays at the opening and close of meeting; it even has a ceremony in imitation of the solemn service of the Lord's Supper.

Nothing but a religious institution would dare to do such things. To attempt it would be a mockery—an insult to God, a glaring profanity. Besides these services, Masonry invests all the gross and material instruments it employs with such a sacredness as that they are used as religious symbols. The square, for example; a tool for mechanics to work by is, in Masonic parlance, a significant emblem of morality; it is to square our actions. Each action of life is to be approved or condemned as it coincides with, or deviates from, those eternal principles symbolized by the square. Dr. Jones, are the eternal principles of your faith symbolized by a piece of iron wrought into an angle of 90 degrees? It must be a pretty cold, hard, flat symbol.

Again, of the common gavel. Daniel Sickles says: "This is an instrument made use of by operative masons to break off the corners of rough stones, the better to fit them for the builders' use; but we, as free and accepted Masons, are taught to make use of it for the more noble and glorious purpose of divesting our hearts and consciences of all the vices and superfluities of life, thereby fitting our minds, as living stones, for that spiritual building, that house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens." What, Dr. Jones, is a common stone-hammer the symbol of fitting your mind for heaven?" Is a piece of iron, with a handle in it, an instrument to ripen you and your parishioners for glory? Why the stone-hammer alone? Why not the meat-ax, the pick and the grubbing-hoe? What more sacred about a stone-hammer than about a hatchet, or a sledge-hammer? Such symbols of heaven, Dr. Jones, you know very well, God never made; and when you preach to your people about heaven, you don't dare to symbolize its glories by stone-hammers. You wouldn't be allowed to carry your stone-hammer religion into the pulpit; much less to the bedside of some old man of God just about going to heaven.

Again, the 24-inch gauge, that the mechanic uses to lay out his work, teaches the Mason to divide his time into three equal parts: eight hours for the service of God; the one-third part of an iron or wooden stick to point out the sacred hours for God's worship and a distressed worthy brother, eight for his usual vocations; and eight for refreshment and sleep.

Again, the six jewels—three immovable: The square, the level, and the plumb. The square inculcates morality; the level equality, and the plumb rectitude of character. The three movable: The rough ashlar, the perfect ashlar and the trestle-board; the rough ashlar, to remind us of our nude and imperfect state by nature; the perfect ashlar, of that state of perfection at which we hope to arrive by our own endeavors and the blessing of God, and by the trestle-board we are taught to endeavor to erect our spiritual building in accordance with the designs laid down by the Supreme Architect of the Universe in the great book of nature and revelation which is our spiritual, moral and Masonic trestle-board. Only one more of your sacred religious symbols, Dr. Jones, and that is the lambskin. And of this the authority says: "The lamb has in all ages been deemed an emblem of innocence; the lambskin is, therefore, to remind the Mason of that purity of life and conduct which is so essentially necessary to his gaining admission into the celestial lodge above, where the Supreme Architect of the Universe presides.

Do you still say, Doctor, that Masonry is not a religion, when every piece of iron, block of wood, and patch of leather found in it point us to heaven—fit us as living stones for the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens, and prepare us for the grand lodge above? What more can religion do? What is the use for any other religion than one to secure such ends? If Masonry can teach such morality, lead to such purity, so fit men for heaven, and free them from sin, that is all that Jesus Christ can do, or aimed to do by dying on the cross. It is all that his blood proposes to do—to free from all sin.

Now, Dr. Jones, what is your predicament? You are in a system that you admit has no Christ in it, and yet it proposes to save men; to free them from sin and take them to heaven—a Christless system taking men to heaven; while on the Sabbath-day you teach your people that the blood of Jesus Christ alone cleanses from all sin. You are living in a Christ-denying system, through the week, that proposes to take men to heaven without Christ; and on Sabbath you preach that there is no other name by which men can be saved but by the name of Jesus. What a stupendous antagonism you are to yourself! What an inexpressible inconsistency! In charity I say, you do not see it. "Father, forgive them for they know not what they do." But others see it. Many in the world see it. God sees it; and it is to be devoutly hoped that ere long you will get your eyes open to see it.

But if the fact had only a negative force it would not make so much difference. It might be left to work out its negative harm; but a theory of a religion that has no Christ in it is a false theory; it is a deception; it allures men into it, holding out a promise of salvation when it cannot give it; it gilds its entrance-way by promises of freeing from sin and fitting men as stones for a heavenly temple, while it never fulfilled a single promise of the kind. Into its glittering trap-way millions have entered, saying: "It is a religion, and all the religion that I want, and more and better religion than is found in the church." They have been lulled to sleep by vain, heartless, Christless prayers, and Bible-readings, and soul-destroying ceremonies, and many have gone down to their graves, soul-deceived, thinking it was well when it was not; hoping in it when there was nothing to hope in, and the souls were lost forever through its deception.

Dr. Jones, when those souls went out of this world believing that Masonry would save them, and it did not, where was your responsibility? How much had your membership in the lodge to do with their eternal delusion? You may preach yourself blind saying that no man can be saved only through the blood of Christ, but if your life says that men can be saved by a system that has no Christ in it, oh, beware lest your life may drag many, many more into the downward path than your words can send in the upward course.

Bear with me while I read you a solemn statement in Jeremiah's prophecy, chap. 11: 33, 34: "Therefore hast thou also taught the wicked ones thy ways; also in thy skirts is found the blood of the souls of the poor innocents."

God cannot hear a Masonic prayer, offered by Masonic ritual; it is Christless; a Masonic Bible-reading cannot be accepted of God. Infinitely better were every prayer, Bible-reading and every allusion to God blotted out of the Masonic ritual, and the institution stood out as one that made no pretence to know God; it might then be freed from the awful stains of deceived and ruined and lost souls.

But, Dr. Jones, Masonry acknowledges that it had its source in heathenism. It claims to be of heathen kinship. On the 35th page of Mackey's Lexicon, reference is made to ancient customs of the heathen that the author calls Dionysian mysteries, in which the peculiar legend was the murder of Bacchus by the Titans, and his subsequent restoration to life. These he names. Those truly Masonic institutions, on the 313th page of the same book, alluding to several of the most important of these mysteries, such as that of Osiris and Isis in Egypt, of Eleusis in Greece, and the Druidical and Scandinavian rites confined to the Gothic and Celtic tribes. The author says of the connection between these mysteries and speculative Masonry: "They both emanated from the same source;" and, once more yet, the same writer, after an account of the rite of perambulation as used by the Hindoos, Greeks, Romans and Druids, a purely pagan custom, says: "We find in the universal prevalence of this ceremony, and the invariable mode of passing from the east to the west by way of the south, a pregnant evidence of the common source of all these rites, to which Freemasonry is also indebted for its existence."

Dr. Jones, what do you say? Can you be in membership with a system that admits its own birth to be of heathen ceremonies? When you were passing from the east to the west by way of the south, did you know that you were going through the rite of perambulation observed by the Hindoos, Greeks, Romans and Druids?

Doctor, I said, at first, I thought that you did not know these things, and I think so still; but you cannot say that any more, for I am telling them to you.

Can one side of your heart warm to the Lord Jesus, and the other side to heathenism? Can you step about in your pulpit on Sabbath, pressing the claims of Jesus on dying men, and walk around the lodge-room on a week night, following the Hindoos and the Druids? If Christ cannot get the whole of your heart and mine, he will not have any of it. He will not share with heathenism. He will bear no compromise. Satan is quite satisfied with a half-hearted service, for well he knows that when he gets the first half, he is sure to get the other, for Christ will not have it.

We may not wonder that an unbeliever can be satisfied with a religion that emanated from heathenism. He does not care for religion, and a heathen kind will serve him as well as any other; but for a Christian, and especially a Christian minister, to take part one day in a pagan ceremony, and another day in a Christian service; to spend one night in the week where Christ is not known, cannot be legally talked about, nor prayed to, and another night, the same week, where no other name can be mentioned but his; one day drinking wine from a human skull—a heathen travesty on the sacred service of the Lord's Supper, and another day of the week taking into hand and lips those solemn symbols of bread and wine which the Lord of glory appointed. Dr. Jones, it is an unspeakable mystery. Have you any way to explain the appalling inconsistency? Don't you know that a Christless prayer is a mockery? Don't you know that to cut the name of Christ out of the Bible, as Masonry does, is profanity, Christ-rejecting, and God-defying? If you are reading the Bible for your own edification, do you first cut the name of Christ out of it? Why do you do it as a Mason?

When you use a Bible to preach from, you don't cut the name of Christ out of it. When you come to talk to a dying man, you don't take the name of Christ out of the text. Why do you do it in Masonry? Surely you did not know that a Bible was not fit to be a Masonic Bible until you cut the name of Jesus out of it. (2 Thess. 3: 6.) Well, now you know it, and if your conscience is tender you will not be able to stay all night in a system that is compelled to cut the name of Jesus out of its constitution. I assert it, right here, to be an absolute impossibility that an intelligent Christian, who knows who Christ is—the only way of approach to God—can conscientiously join in a service that actually puts Christ out of it and is built upon a foundation that necessitates that he shall be put out of it. Every man ought to study this matter for himself. He ought to procure for himself a Masonic standard authority, and there are plenty of them; and if he finds, after informing himself on the subject, that when he was initiated it was into a Christless service, with Christless prayers, and Christless Scriptures, and a symbolic salvation that had no Christ in it, let him on his knees ask God if he can be true to his vows as a Christian and at the same time be in sworn league with a lodge that has no Christ in it. If in your childhood, when you were ignorant of mathematics, some one had taught you that two and two make six, you would not continue in that ignorance when you grew into manhood. You could not live as a man in the ignorance of what every child of 3 years old ought to know. This is incomparably more important in the sphere of morals. If in some day of your ignorance some party or parties taught you that it was right to swear profanely, to do something you had no knowledge of, to worship God in a profane or Christless way, to mutilate the Scriptures, or to play a farce scene imitating the solemnity of death and the resurrection, ought you to continue such false things as these when you have opportunity to know better?

Dr. Jones, will you not at least put away childish things when you have grown to be a man? I pity the man who says he cannot see the sunlight because he is stone-blind, but we account it unworthy the man who says, in the noon-day light, that it is night and he cannot see, only because he refuses to open his eyes.

Dr. Jones, no man has a right to be ignorant of what he ought to know, and has the means to know if he would use them; and no man has a right to do a wicked thing under that sham cloak of ignorance.

So we conclude this thought by saying: Dr. Jones, if you are a member of one of these Christless lodges, you ought to leave it; for no one can be an active lover of Christ and a sworn member of a Christless lodge, provided he knows its true character; and (2), that no man can be innocent in going with such a fraternity without knowing its true character, especially when it is so remarkably easy to find it out. So this line of thought and fact leaves every man, and especially every Christian man, and very especially every Christian minister, wholly without excuse.

CHRISTIAN AMENDMENT TO THE UNITED STATES CONSTITUTION.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

At a mass-meeting held in the Second Reformed Presbyterian church, Chambers street, Boston, Tuesday evening, February 27, the pastor thus stated the object of the gathering:

On the 25th of January, 1894, the following resolution was introduced in the United States Senate, by Senator Frye, of Maine, and on the same day in the House, by Representative Morse, of Massachusetts.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two thirds of each house concurring therein, That the following amended form of Preamble of the Constitution of the United States be proposed for ratification in conventions in the several States, which, when ratified by conventions in three-fourths of the States, shall be valid as a part of the said Constitution, namely:

PREAMBLE.

"We, the people of the United States, devoutly acknowledging the supreme authority and just government of Almighty God in all the affairs of men and nations; grateful to him for our civil and religious liberty, and encouraged by the assurance of his Word to invoke his guidance, as a Christian nation, according to his appointed ways through Jesus Christ.....do ordain," etc.

The resolution was referred to the Judiciary Committee of each house. A hearing was given on Thursday, February 1st, by a sub-committee of the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, for arguments in support of the resolution. Rev. D McAllister, D. D., LL. D., of Pittsburgh, made an able plea. Another hearing is to be had before the full committee on March 5th.

The object of this meeting is to let this country hear Boston's voice in favor of the proposed amendment. During the anti-slavery controversy, Boston gave tone to Abolition sentiment throughout the North. And in this movement to recognize the crown-rights and royal prerogatives of King Jesus, Boston must not be second. Wendell Phillips, Charles Sumner, and the Garrisonians brought the "irrepressible conflict" to an issue. Joseph Cook, Dr. A. J. Gordon, and Dr. A. A. Miner will bring this war upon secularism in civil and political affairs to final issue.

On February 9, 1864, a large committee of representatives waited on President Lincoln and read an address on behalf of an amendment such as this. He replied: "The general aspect of your movement I cordially approve. In regard to particulars, I must ask time to deliberate, as the work of amending the Constitution should not be done hastily. I will carefully examine your paper, in order more fully to comprehend its contents than is possible from merely hearing it read, and will take such action upon it as my responsibility to our Maker and our country demands." Later, Lincoln said to one of the members of this committee: "You got the abolition of slavery in my first administration, and I hope you will get a constitutional recognition of the King of kings in my second administration."

1. This amendment would bring our written Constitution into harmony with the vital constitution of the nation. This country was settled by Christian men. The constitutions of the thirteen original States recognized God and his law, and a similar acknowledgment is found in forty-two out of forty-four States to-day. In 1824 the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania declared that Christianity is the common law of our land. In February, 1892, the Supreme Court of the United States declared that "this is a Christian nation." The written Constitution is the translation into legal language of the vital forces of the nation. Christianity is, and always has been, a vital force in our national life. This fact should be incorporated in our supreme law.

2. It would be a suitable recognition of the nation's responsibility to Christ the King. In the hour of the nation's trial, March 2, 1863, the Senate of the United States petitioned President Lincoln to proclaim a day of fasting and humiliation and confession, "encouraged," as they expressed it, "by the assurances of His Word, to seek him for succor according to his appointed way, through Jesus Christ." The President appointed April 30, 1863. If the nation depends upon the mediation of Christ for forgiveness and acceptance, his authority and law should be formally recognized.

3. It would conserve public rights. The nation that does not recognize the divine rights will soon disregard human. In our Gulf States, the 14th and 15th amendments are not recognized. There is a missing link in the Constitution. This Christian amendment would make these operative. Joseph Cook says: "I believe in States' rights, but not in going over Niagara." It is said the general government has no power to interfere and protect the colored people against lynching. If it has not the power, it ought to. It was said the government had no power to interfere in the riot of New Orleans, in which the Italians were slain. But the government had to pay an indemnity to Italy. If the government must pay an indemnity, it ought to have the power to punish the crime. This amendment will secure it. Utah is knocking for admission to Statehood. Both parties are willing. As twenty-one out of twenty-six counties are priest-ridden and polygamous, the State would elect polygamists to Congress. This amendment would forestall that national disgrace. Both houses of Congress voted to close the gates of the World's Fair on Sabbath. But the courts kept them open. This amendment would save all such moral legislation from inglorious defeat.

4. The influence of the Constitution upon the nation would then be for good and not for evil. The call for the Philadelphia convention, Jan. 18, 1871, emphasizes this: "There is no political document so all-important to the American statesman and the American citizen as the Constitution of the United States. All laws, all customs, all forms of administration are shaped by it. Everything in any State, corporation, or business that affects a citizen in the remotest degree as to "life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness" is tested by it, and stands and works only as it agrees with it. Year by year its moulding power is felt. The President, the Congress and the courts are coming more and more into evident agreement with what is there written. Our statesmen and our whole people are learning their Americanism, as to its letter and spirit, from that great instrument. This is as it should be. This was intended from the beginning.

But, at the same time, it is a serious matter if that Constitution should be found wanting in any principle or any matter of fact. The deficiency will in due time work mischief. Error in the Constitution will work as powerfully as truth, and what is left of it may one day be formally declared un-American. And one such serious matter there is; one unnecessary and most unfortunate omission. God and Christianity are not once alluded to; although the Constitution is itself the product of a Christian civilization, and although it purports to represent the mind of a Christian people, who, in all their State constitutions, had made explicit reference to both God and religion. Hence it is that all the laws of this country in favor of Christian morality are enacted and enforced outside the Constitution. They rest only upon the basis of what is called common law. We have, strictly, no oath, no law against blasphemy, Sabbath-breaking or polygamy, that has any better foundation. And, as matters seem to be going, it will soon be discovered and decreed that common law is only another name for custom, which has no binding force. And then where are we? In atheism, corruption and anarchy.

Let our Constitution be Christianized and the tide is changed. Instead of making for evil, it makes for good. A new force will be introduced into our Republic. A new life will be infused in the veins of our nation. Our nation will be incorporated as a moral subject of the mediatorial government of King Jesus. "Blessed is the nation whose God is the Lord."

Boston, Mass.

ROMAN CATHOLIC POLITICS.

From a minister in Denver, Colorado: "The temporary power or civil authority is not supreme and independent, but in the nature of things subordinate to the spiritual, the church." He also says: "The Pope is the proper authority to decide for me whether the Constitution of this country is, or is not, repugnant to God's law." The encyclical and syllabus of Pius IX says: "All advocates of free speech, all who obtain the liberty of the press, all who assert the liberty of conscience and of religious worship, let them be anathema." In the unum sanctum Bull of Boniface, in the thirteenth century, it was declared, determined and decreed that "it was absolutely necessary to salvation that every human being should be subject to the Roman pontiff."—New York Catholic Review.

"I acknowledge no civil power, I am the subject of no prince, and I claim more than this—I claim to be a supreme judge and director of the consciences of men, of the peasant that tills the ground, of the prince that sits on the throne, of the household that lives in the shade of privacy, and of the legislature that makes the laws of the kingdom. I am the sole, last and supreme judge of what is right and wrong. Moreover, we declare it to be necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff."—Cardinal Manning.

A dispatch from San Jose, Costa Rica, Feb. 23, via New York, March 6, announces that "Bernardo A. Thiel, bishop of Costa Rica, and several other prominent Catholics, clerical and lay, have been arrested here, charged with plotting revolution. The authorities are in hourly expectation of an attack. The police have been armed with rifles and the militia are under arms, prepared to turn out at a moment's notice. Bishop Thiel's purpose is said to be the establishment of a government of Catholics under his direction. For a similar attempt in 1885 he was expelled by President Fernandez."

THE NEW NORTHFIELD AUDITORIUM.

The place of meeting of the summer conferences at Northfield, Mass., has hitherto been Recitation Hall, which was built in 1885. It is one of the seminary buildings. The basement is occupied by lavatories, the first floor by school-rooms, and the second floor by a large hall, which, with its wings, is capable of seating about 900 persons, and which is used as the principal chapel and concert, lecture and assembly room for the school. The conferences have outgrown the accommodation this hall affords, and for several years it has been felt that something larger and more suitable was required. At the close of the last August conference Mr. Moody and some friends projected a new auditorium, which will be ready for use next June, and which will be built upon a prominent eminence overlooking the other Northfield seminary buildings, and commanding a charming view of the Connecticut Valley.

The auditorium is after the Romanesque order of architecture, of red brick, 122x136 feet. The ground floor is capable of seating about 1,500 people and the gallery 800. There is a spacious platform, behind which is a choir gallery for 300 voices. The floor rises in a gentle incline. There are means of ingress and egress in every wall. The hall is constructed with an eye to utility, but its gracefulness of structure will make it one of the most attractive buildings in the valley. It is one of the largest auditoriums in the State, outside of Boston. Messrs. Fuller and Wheeler, of Albany, N. Y., are the architects. It is to cost when complete about $60,000. Toward this amount, Mrs. Julia Billings, of Woodstock, has pledged $5,000; H. M. Mood, of Boston, has promised to raise $10,000; D. L. Moody is to raise $10,000; and Chas. R. Otis, of Yonkers, N. Y., and O. H. Greenleaf, of Springfield, will contribute generously toward the building.

With increased facilities the coming conventions are sure to be of greater interest than ever. The August conference will deal this year with a connected presentation of the Christian doctrines: Man's innate sin; his need of salvation; redemption in Christ; regeneration under the power of the Holy Spirit; justification by faith; the doctrine of free grace; the baptism of the Holy Spirit for service; the resurrection and the second coming of Christ. Some of the ablest living Bible teachers will attend. Mr. Moody will preside, and the Rev. F. B. Meyer, of London, and Dr. A. J. Gordon, of Boston, are invited to take a prominent share in the proceedings.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

The liquor traffic.—Woman Suffrage.—The Lodges.—Religious News.—An Incongruity.

Two branches of business seem never to be affected by hard times:—the theatres and the liquor-saloons. In fact, as regards the former, the craze for amusement was never more general, and never were larger sums paid to hear and see a famous actress or prima-donna. With poverty and suffering on every hand, and the murmurs of the unemployed rising in threatening menace, the ranks of worldly and thoughtless ones who live only in and for the present, show no depletion.

To come back to the rum-shops. Out of 115 cases of distress investigated in Boston, 114 were caused, directly or indirectly, by the liquor traffic, and only one was traceable to pure misfortune! There is a bill now before the Legislature to establish public agencies to sell at cost, thus doing away with all legalized dram-shops, and that fruitful source of mischief in every prohibition town, the druggists' license. Such a law would certainly strike a death-blow at rum as a political factor, reduce temptation, and be better, in many respects, than the present one. As a stepping-tone to complete prohibition, many will favor it; but there are objectionable features, the worst being that it gives the traffic into the hands of the State, and thus invests it with a mantle of respectability. The enormous profits made in this iniquitous business do not always compensate for the risks run; and doubtless John O'Neil, the Vermont liquor-seller, whose case has gone on from court to court for twelve years, now thinks so. His offence was the sending of 457 jugs of liquor to Rutland, and, there being a separate penalty on each jug, the whole sentence amounted to 79 years in prison. O'Neil, like Cain of old, feeling that his punishment was greater than he could bear, appealed to the Supreme Court, which adjudged it to be "excessive and unusual," and let him off with two months' imprisonment, and a fine of $6,160. It would be interesting to know just what the bills amount to which the State has had to pay for the paupers and criminals made by his saloon. I am of opinion that it might, if reckoned up, amount to a much larger sum than his fine, large as it is. The Foxboro Hospital for Inebriates has cost Massachusetts nearly two hundred thousand dollars during the short time it has been in operation, and now it is asking for additional appropriations to undo the mischief which the State licenses. Serious charges of extravagance, and no cures to show for it, have been brought against the institution.

Eleven dollars per week for each patient is a rather high rate, considering that the highest figure reached by any other public institution is $4.43, and the average per week only $3.20. The question arises why Massachusetts should treat her dipsomaniacs so much better than any other of her sick, insane and pauper classes.

Tax-payers who do not themselves use the weed, would also like to know why she should pay $87.50 for cigars for her legislative committees to smoke. The Committee on Prisons consumed $35 worth, and the one on Charitable Institutions an equal amount. Perhaps they needed to have their understandings assisted in some way, but one feels inclined to be doubtful of conclusions reached through a medium of tobacco-smoke.

The Superior Court has decided that "it is not constitutional" to submit woman suffrage to popular vote, taking the ground that the people have vested the legislative power in their representatives, and cannot constitutionally exercise it themselves. Whether they have really divested themselves of what should be an inherent right, or not, it is certain that they have many times exercised it, and this is pointed out in the report of the dissenting minority. The judges who have decided in the negative try to make out that a popular vote on the rum question or the Australian ballot is not a parallel case; but there is a great deal of the distinction between tweedle-dee and tweedle-dum in their argument. However, the woman-suffragists are not at all cast down. They remember that their opponents last year tacked an amendment to the bill providing that the measure should not go into effect until ratified by popular vote, and then nine-tenths of the members who had voted for it showed their true colors by turning round and defeating the amendment to the bill. But the issue cannot again be dodged in this way. It must be met fairly, once for all.

The secret societies of Bar Harbor, Me., according to a Maine paper, have initiated an unusual number of applicants lately. Times may be hard, but there will always be fools enough to pay initiation fees for the privilege of putting their necks under the lodge yoke. Portland claims the unenviable distinction of containing more Odd-fellows in proportion to the population than any other town in the world, the proportion being three to one; but Walla Walla, in Washington, now claims to be ahead, with an Odd-fellow for every two voters. Mrs. Mary Elizabeth Lease, the Populist woman-leader of Kansas, is in Boston, but I have not yet heard that she has been interviewed by any deputation from the Masonic Temple to learn "how she was made a Mason." A Masonic relative kindly allowed her to conceal herself where she could hear and see all the initiation ceremonies. So the name of this new Joan of Arc can be added to Elizabeth St. Leger's. Mrs. Lease was sixteen at the time, and the light which is now being poured on the lodge had scarcely dawned. To-day, thanks to the work of the N. C. A., women can become "bright Masons," by paying fifty cents for one of its exposes, without resorting to such humiliating expedients as playing eaves-dropper, or donning masculine disguise. When there are such multitudes of women all over the land who have availed themselves of this privilege, and can give the Masonic grip as well as Mrs. Lease, it is strange that the fraternity is so stirred up over her undeniable assertion that she "is qualified to be made a Mason."

Dr. P. S. Maxam is soon to leave Boston for the South Church at Springfield—somebody has said that there is an old Old South in almost every New England town—where he will succeed the venerable Dr. G. S. Buckingham, who has been its pastor for nearly fifty years. His defection from the Baptist to the Congregationalist faith does not involve any material change of views, as he has not been for a long time a believer in their distinguishing doctrine of close communion. "The duty of the ministry," as he said to a reporter, "is not to preach denominationalism, but to advance Christianity by whatever creed it is called." His chief reason, however, is that he is an author as well as preacher, and desires to follow his literary bent, for which the exacting life of a popular city pastor, always between the millstones of his pastoral or social duties, leaves no time. Meanwhile the Immanuel church of Roxbury has given a call to Rev. C. H. Beale, of Lansing, Mich., a native, however, of Rhode Island. New England, in calling Western pastors to fill her pulpits, only takes back her own, but broadened and enriched through their Western training and education.

A Middleboro pastor has lately raised quite a tempest in a teaspoon by a recent article in the Forum, entitled, "A Religious Analysis of a New England Town," in which he refers to the Protestant churches in that place as "religious clubs," and the trend of church activities as too much in the direction of "Boys' Brigades," dramatic entertainments, suppers, sociables, and things of a like nature. It is truth that cuts most deeply, and the presumption is that there is enough truth in the article to account for so much fluttering on the part of the wounded ones. The article was meant by Mr. Hale as a vigorous plea for church union, as it is the existence of so many poor, struggling, debt-laden churches in a place where half the number would suffice that seems to render such questionable ways of raising money a necessity.

Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, has found that his engagements will not allow him to speak in Tammany Hall on St. Patrick's Day. There is something incongruous in a speech in such a place, and in glorification of such a day, from one whose ancestors were Puritans of the Puritans, away back in the times of Winthrop and Endicott; and perhaps the honorable Senator is himself dimly conscious that "it wouldn't be just the thing."

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, March 7, 1894.

A delegation of ministers of the Reformed Presbyterian church appeared before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives yesterday and presented some unanswerable arguments in favor of the resolution recently offered by Representative Morse, and referred to that committee, providing for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, recognizing God and Jesus Christ. A number of ministers of other churches were present. The main obstacle which confronts this resolution is that which delays other great moral reforms—indifference. If a poll of the Senate and House of Representatives were taken upon this question, I have not the slightest doubt that nine out of every ten of them would say that it was right and proper that God and Jesus Christ should be formally recognized in the Constitution of the leading Christian nation of the world. Yet, the indifference of Senators and Representatives may defer action upon this resolution, just as it has upon similar ones which have been offered in preceding Congresses, none of which were ever voted upon. How to overcome this indifference is a question that should interest the brightest Christian intellects in America. In my humble opinion these Presbyterian ministers have set an example worthy of being followed by all other denominations. Let the Christians make known their wishesin this matter and Congressional indifference will disappear, just as it did when the Christians of the land demanded Congressional legislation for the closing of the World's Fair on Sunday. Nobody on earth is more susceptible to influence than Congress, and no influence is more powerful in this country, when exercised in concert, than that of the churches. That the members of all churches favor the adoption of this resolution is, I believe, generally conceded. It only remains then for the churches to make their wishes known to their Senators and Representatives in Congress, in order to get it adopted.

The long-to-be-remembered series of Moody and Sankey meetings closed to-night, and thousands of the people of Washington who desired to attend them were unable to do so. This may be considered a strong statement, but it is strictly true. Many of our people who are fortunate enough to have had the time to go and wait for the opening of the doors, boast of having attended all or nearly all of the meetings; but many more, not so fortunate, have gone night after night as early as they could get there, only to find the doors closed and the great hall filled. Mr. Moody endeavored to remedy this state of affairs to some extent during the closing nights by refusing to admit ladies until after 7:30 o'clock, his idea being to give the men who had been unable to attend a chance to do so. At the special request of Mr. Moody, a number of the churches will at once begin revival meetings, so as to take advantage of the religious interest aroused by the big meetings.

Bishop Hurst is presiding over the thirty-first session of the Washington Conference of the M. E. Church, which met here this morning. This conference, which embraces the States of Maryland, Virginia, West Virginia, the District of Columbia and a part of Western Pennsylvania, is the most influential and representative colored conference in the M. E. church, numbering 147 ministers, representing a membership of more than 27,000.

Mrs. Clark, who, with her husband, has been in charge of the mission work carried on in India by the American Baptist Missionary Union for some years, delivered an address on her work at Calvary Baptist church yesterday afternoon. Mr. and Mrs. Clark went among the savages of the hills, called the "head cutters," because of their ferocity, and have reduced their language to a written and printed form, a portion of the Bible, a collection of hymns, a few school books and a Naga-English dictionary being now nearly ready for distribution. Schools and churches have been established in eight villages, and the church in the village in which Mr. and Mrs. Clark reside has a membership of sixty. This gives a fair idea of what may be accomplished by two determined people, as it was not until last year that assistance was sent to Mr. and Mrs. Clark.

The House of Representatives, since passing the bill for the coinage of the seigniorage of the silver in the Treasury, has devoted the most of its time to the regular annual appropriation bills, but the coinage bill threatens to make even more trouble in the Senate, already in trouble enough on account of the failure of the majority to agree on the tariff bill, than it did in the House, if the attempt to have it considered to the exclusion of the tariff bill, now being made, succeeds; for that would mean nothing more nor less than a revival of the scenes which accompanied the long silver contest at the extra session. *

ECHOES OF THE PENNSYLVANIA CONVENTION.

FROM THE NEW ENGLAND SECRETARY.

BOSTON, Mass., Feb. 5, 1894.

Want of opportunity is my only reason for not writing earlier of the Philadelphia convention. Others have ere this given details, and I need only say that the meeting was well planned, carefully worked up, and enthusiastically carried out. The welcome by Pastor Edgar and his session was most cordial, and I cannot speak too highly in commendation of Bro. Edwin Sellew and his devoted wife and Christian household for their ever-expanding and inexhaustible hospitality to the pilgrims. May the Lord reward them a hundred fold.

Arriving a few days in advance, I had an opportunity to call on a goodly number of pastors, and nothing for a long time has cheered me more than the responses which I met. It needs no prophet's ken to discern the attitude of Christian ministers and regenerated members in the church of Christ in the near future on the lodge issue.

"The world will love its own," and those who are of the world will "love the things of the world;" but those who are "not of the world" reject the "cup of devils" and heed the "voice from heaven," "Come out of her, my people, that ye be not partakers of her sins, and that ye receive not of her plagues." Bros. Merritt and McIntire renewed and re-affirmed their former testimonies, and Bro. Anderson bore a faithful testimony as far as he had descended into the pit, which he thanked God was not as far as some others had gone.

Returning, I stopped over in New York to address the students in the "Missionary Training College." Reaching the chapel three minutes late, I found my audience waiting, and was introduced by Bro. Professor and Vice-President Farr, who explained the object of my lecture to be a description of the pagan worships with which they would meet in all parts of the world where they should go to preach the Gospel. After an hour spent on my charts, Bro. McIntire confirmed what I had said about the ceremonies, oaths, and the "fifth libation" of the Knight Templar, and added some very instructive and helpful facts from his own experience. Dr. Peck, of Boston, was present and gave some statements that he heard Mr. Finney make at Oberlin, years ago. How far the intelligence received may be carried by those who listened, no one can foretell; how long it will endure, God only knows; but it was bread cast upon the waters, which, like the testimony of the sainted Pres. Finney, "shall return after many days."

After a hearty dinner, and social Christian conference at the "Faith Home," I had just time to look in upon good Sister Prindall and her work of mercy at the Florence Mission, 21 Bleecker street, and Bro. James Mathews, 22 State street, before taking the boat for Boston. Reaching home on the early morning of the 2nd, I was reassured that it is safe to trust in the Lord in the words: "There shall no evil befall thee; neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling."

J. P. STODDARD.

FROM THE EASTERN SECRETARY.

(Crowded out of last week's issue.)

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 10, 1894.

DEAR CYNOSURE:—The Philadelphia Convention turned out just as I expected—"all right." There seemed to be but one opinion among friends. So far as I know they unanimously pronounce it a grand success. Lodgemen, of course, felt that we had come to torment them before their time.

Probably the severest storm of the season was in progress when the hour arrived for commencement. The streets were sloppy; the falling sleet was pelted, by the wind, upon those who ventured out. All the previous night and morning snow and rain had been descending. In short, it was not such a day as we should have recommended for the opening of an important convention, but God sent it, and we said: "It is all right; he knows best; perhaps this is to be a test of our faith."

We found, as delegation after delegation of the friends marched in, that they had planned to be there, and they were there. Among the first to appear was Bro. Stephen Merritt, his face smiling as if it were a June morning, and he had not a care on earth. His ringing testimony was given with his accustomed fervor, and prepared the way for Bros. McIntire and Anderson, who held the undivided attention of the audience.

Owing to the inclement weather, I requested that the lower part of the church might be prepared for the opening session. This spacious room proved none too large for our accommodation. All the other sessions were held in the main audience room.

I have attended conventions where the numbers present have been more, but, I think, never have I seen an anti-secrecy convention where those of so many different religious views have been drawn together. There were present white and black, Jew and Gentile, Presbyterian and Quaker, Methodist and Baptist, Mennonite and Congregationalist, infidel and lodge advocates. Also, the D. D. and the man who said that he had joined, among others, the H. F. lodge. He did not know what the H. F. stood for. One of the D. D.'s suggested that it might stand for Hell-Fire, as its tendency was in that direction. There were those who believed in singing Psalms, those who believed in singing hymns, and those who did not believe in singing at all. Some stood during prayer, some kneeled, some reclined and some sat erect, each acting according to either his or her training and convictions of right.

The weather of the second day proved more favorable, and as the sun broke through the clouds the friends came in larger numbers. The entertainment provided was all accepted, and no friend wishing the privilege of entertaining was refused.

The open parliament found the enthusiasm growing, and carried it almost beyond the president's control. A cunning, crafty lawyer appeared in defence of the Masonic lodge. His manifest misleading design was so apparent that many, full of indignation, were anxious to show up his fallacies. The young man belonging to many lodges, among them the H. F., said he had little knowledge, and no one questioned his statement. He showed his spirit in demanding more time, when granted twice what belonged to him.

Drs. H. H. George and D. McAllister fittingly gave the concluding addresses, in what has proved, in many ways, to be among the most successful of anti-secrecy conventions.

God has given us another signal victory. Let us pray that the divine leaven at work in this gathering may more and more permeate that community until all shall walk in the light.

W. B. STODDARD.

LETTERS RECEIVED BY REV. W. B STODDARD.

SOUDERTON, Pa., Feb. 28, 1894.

MY DEAR BROTHER:—I arrived home from the convention at 11 last night. I was very sorry that I could not stay to the close and hear all of that very interesting and earnest address by Bro. McAllister; but I had to leave at 9:30, to make the train and meet my promises. I also felt desirous, since the convention honored me—a stranger to most present, and a quiet spectator—with the vice-presidency of the State organization, to say a few words in encouragement of this noble movement, and concerning the position of our church on this question; but, as the discussion was lively and time precious, so that even speakers who came many miles were cut short, I felt perfectly satisfied. I, however, wish to express my thanks to the organization, through you, for the recognition and honor—unexpected and unsolicited—conferred upon my church (Mennonite), and myself, in electing me to this office. I would be pleased, as a vice-president, to be kept informed of all movements of the State organization, so that I may perform the duties devolving upon me as such officer faithfully, according to the ability God gives me. To this end I desire to keep up communication with the workers. Any duties devolving on me, or any work required of me, shall receive my attention to my best ability.

Is it the intention to hold annual conventions? As regards having a meeting here, at Souderton, I desire to have a little time to consider how and when. I think we are not quite prepared yet. We are at present quietly leading young men out of the lodge, which may, under our circumstances, be the better for the immediate present. I hope, however, that the time will speedily come when we can have here a public meeting, and then have some seceders to stand by us as helpers.

I send you herewith a copy of our paper, the Mennonite. The next issue will contain references to the convention. Your brother in Christ,

ALLEN M. FRETZ.

FROM JAMES LEARMOUTH, EAST SOMERVILLE, MASS.

"I enjoy your paper (the Cynosure) much. It has given me light on a great many things about secret societies. We have, in Somerville, a branch of the A. P. A., and I find that it is a hindrance to Christian work. They have their weekly meetings on Friday nights, the same time as our church prayer-meetings. Every other night there are other lodges to attend, and Friday night is only prayer-meeting night. The result is that men who were in the habit of going to (prayer) meeting go to the A. P. A. Anything that will draw men away from Christ and his worship is wrong."

Do you take the Cynosure? Why not? Do you pay for it? Why don't you?

CORRESPONDENCE.

MRS. LEASE'S FREEMASONRY.

SEWARD, Kan., Feb. 22, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—I clip the following from the Kansas City Star of February 17, concerning Mrs. Lease and her presidency of the State Board of Charities:

Asked if she would resign, Mrs. Lease said: "I don't know what I shall do. My lecture engagements may compel me to, and besides it takes up too much of my time. I have other plans than either politics or lectures. You won't believe it when I tell you that I am a Mason. Well, I am. I have as perfect a right to wear this cross of a Knight Templar," she said, pointing to a charm she always wears upon her bosom, "as any man who belongs to the order. I am a member of Hugh de Payne Commandery of Fort Scott. I know you will not believe it, but I can prove myself to any Knight Templar. Here, if you are a Mason, I can give you the Blue Lodge grip, and I can tell you all about the Templar degrees. Before long I am going to institute a lodge of Masons among women. They have as much right to belong to the order as men. The old requirement that a candidate for the Masonic degrees must be able to wield the trowel and lay stones is played out. If Masonry is of benefit to men, it could be of more benefit to women. It is a noble order. Nothing has been of greater value or a greater help to me than my Masonry, and I propose to give other women the same advantages. I employed Masonic signs once to save me from personal violence. Why should not other women enjoy the protection the order affords? So look out for it. Within two years I will have instituted a lodge of women Masons. I know the work thoroughly, and I can institute a lodge without the help of any man."

I consider it of general interest, because reported from a public character prominent in the politics of this State. It may serve to explain the prominence enjoyed by the lady named, in connection with a party hatched by means of the Farmers' Alliance as an incubator; and to show whither tends the influence of secret-lodge-originated political parties generally, and what class of people (or politicians) are generally to be found incubating and nursing such monstrosities into existence.

Mrs. Lease says: "If Masonry is of benefit to men, it could be of more benefit to women. (How?) It is a noble order. (Why?) Nothing has been of greater value, or a greater help to me, than my Masonry, and I propose to give other women the same advantages."

I suppose the following is a case in point, showing why all women should enjoy the advantages of this noble (?) order, and wherein the greater help was found to be of such comforting worth.

"I employed Masonic signs once to save me from personal violence. Why should not other women enjoy the protection the order affords." Now in regard to this personal-violence proposition, the following conclusions may be drawn: To have been saved from assault by Masonic signs, those signs must have been seen by Freemasons whose gallantry, as such, brought them to her rescue. This proves one of two things to be true; that she was assaulted by a Freemason, who desisted only on seeing those signs; or she was assaulted in the presence of Freemasons, who were moved to rescue her only on seeing the signs, but otherwise would have allowed the assault to proceed.

If either or both these positions are fallacious, it must be so because other influences aside from the interest in her aroused by those mystic signs prompted the rescue; and in case this is the correct view of the matter, the claim Mrs. L. makes for the wonderful protective advantages of that noble (?) order, whose noble membership will not put themselves to any trouble to protect an assaulted female upon the true grounds of all manly gallantry, that all virtuous women deserve the protection of all men at all times, and in all places, and under all circumstances whatever, because men are men, and women are women, falls to the ground, bursts like a bubble, and loses all its wind. Yours truly, SUNFLOWER.

WHAT STANDARDS OF MORALS?

PHILOMATH, Ore., Feb. 22, 1894.

It was my privilege to attend the Benton County Teachers' Institute, held at this place the first of the present month. Mr. Ed. Bryan, of Philomath, is the superintendent. The meeting, in the main, was both pleasant and profitable. Mr. Bryan is a very pleasant gentleman. An item connected with the convention deserves special mention.

A very able paper was presented by one of the teachers on manners and morals of the school which was freely and ably discussed. President Bloss, of the Oregon Agricultural College, at Corvallis, sought to impress the teachers with the idea that no standard of morals should be taught in the public schools, but take morals from whenever you find them—from Zoroaster or Confucius.

In reply, we took the position that a standard should be held up. Jesus Christ should be the ideal, as his morality differed from all other systems in the world. The leading agnostic of America says: "We should love our friends and the friends of our friends." Jesus Christ went far beyond this and said: "Love your enemies, do good to them that persecute you and say all manner of evil against you." This cuts right through and across all other systems of morals. To teach according to President Bryan's idea would be to induce a regular Babel of confusion of morals. To teach Christ's morality you have love and harmony.

He further said that, like a preacher, the teacher should never teach at the child, but for the child. In other words, in correcting wrongs, the teacher and preacher should be general and not specific.

We showed that Christ was specific as a minister, and that a hunter does not shoot in the abstract, but aims at his game. A physician is expected to be specific and tell the peculiar ailment and the true remedy.

Our little speech brought the president to his feet again. He put in at least thirty minutes trying to explain, but left the matter, I think, in a worse shape than ever.

It is but an illustration of the present tendency to palliate matters and keep in line with the worldly spirit. We need specific preaching. We want faithful teaching. Man is morally diseased. His pollution is deadly. He needs a thorough, specific remedy; and yet many, very many moral teachers are saying: "All you need is a little panada, gruel, or catnip tea." "Healing the hurt of my people slightly."

I once saw a minister holding a series of meetings, and he seemed very anxious to count members. He requested all in the house to kneel down with him while they prayed just once. Out of respect to him, they all got down; then he said: "Now, as fast as you will accept Christ as your personal Saviour, you may arise." Of course, they could not stay on their knees all night; so they soon began to get up, and he began to thank God for their conversion. There is vastly too much of that and similar work done today, causing many to think they are saved when they are not.

May God give us pastors, evangelists and teachers who are true. A READER.

"'Welsh pictures' is the work of ten Welshmen, among whom illustrating the beauties of Wales has been parcelled out according to the special familiarity of each. The result is a pleasing volume."—London Times.

THE EARTHLY FOOTPRINTS OF OUR RISEN LORD, Illumined.

A continuous narrative of the Four Gospels according to The Revised Version, with introduction by Rev. John Hall, D. D. Illustrated by 113 full-page half tone re-productions. Small 4to, cloth.....net 1.50
Gilt edge, with silk book mark, boxed.....net 2.00
Full morocco, flexible, gilt edges, round corners, boxed.....net 3.75

Pictures reflecting the best in sacred art from Raphael to the present day are scattered profusely through the book.

"To many the life of the Christ will be a new book in this form. Though beyond the introduction it contains no word except what is found in the four Gospels, yet when read continuously, without the breaks necessarily made by the different stories of the four evangelists, the narrative takes on new force and lifelikeness. The very fact that this is not our usual method of reading the Word will give it a new reality."—Golden Rule.

A GIFT OF LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects.

By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

OBITUARY.

JONATHAN LANTZ,

aged 81 years, 7 months and 21 days, died at the residence of his daughter, Mrs. A. E. Davis, 420 South Sixth street, Goshen, Ind., about the middle of February, 1894.

About three months before his death he was prostrated by sickness, and during the last six weeks of his life he was a great sufferer.

He was born in Northumberland county, Penn., June 18, 1812; removed to Ohio in early life, and to Michigan in 1855. There he resided until about eight years ago, when he became a resident of Goshen, living after the death of his wife, with his daughter, in whose home he died.

While large and robust physically, his nature was affectionate and loving as a child, unobtrusive and generous to a fault. From early life a devoted Christian, he was a consistent member of the Presbyterian church, whose familiar figure was rarely absent from his seat. His Bible was his key to the profoundest works of God, the glass through which he looked from nature to nature's God, and its daily use led him from youth to old age in an abiding faith in God and resigned him to his Master's call to his eternal home.

In sending us the notice of his death, Mrs. Davis adds: "Father was a faithful reader and subscriber of the Cynosure for eighteen years, and thought no other paper equalled it."

Eight children survive him and cherish the memory of a beloved and devoted father. His funeral was held on Saturday afternoon, February 17.

Spring Medicine,

Seems to be only another name for Hood's Sarsaparilla, so popular has this excellent preparation become at this season. It possesses just those curative properties desirable in a Spring Medicine. It recuperates the weakened strength, purifies and vitalizes the blood, creates a good appetite, cures biliousness and headache, gives healthy action to the kidneys and liver, and overcomes That Tired Feeling. The remarkable cures of scrofula, salt rheum and other blood diseases, effected by Hood's Sarsaparilla, have won for it the title of "the greatest blood purifier ever discovered." It acts promptly and radically, thoroughly expelling all impurities and poisonous germs from the blood and giving to the vital fluid the quality, quantity and color of health.

Mr. J. J. Robinson, editor of the Lonaconing "Star," writing to C. I. Hood & Co., proprietors of Hood's Sarsaparilla, Lowell, Mass, congratulating them on the cure of William F. Robertson, of Ocean, Md., of catarrh, when the patient was in such a condition that he had bleeding at the nose several times a day, states that he knows the young man who was afflicted. He also writes regarding the sale of Hood's Sarsaparilla in Maryland as follows; "I have watched with interest the increasing popularity of Hood's Sarsaparilla here for some time and I believe it to be a remedy that stands on its merits. One purchaser recommends it to another until the whole town nearly is taking Hood's Sarsaparilla." The peculiar virtues of Hood's Sarsaparilla cause it to be in great demand as a spring medicine. It quickly and thoroughly builds up the system and prepares it to resist the dangers which are threatened by a change of temperature and by such diseases as the grip, pneumonia, malaria and typhoid fever, which are most liable to make their attacks at this season.

The Christian Cynosure.

HENRY M. HUGUNIN - - - Editor.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 15, 1894.

WHAT CONSTITUTES A "STRIKE?"

Week before last, at Milwaukee, Wis., was devoted to an examination of the recent order issued by Judge Jenkins, of the United States Court, forbidding employes of the Northern Pacific Railroad to strike or to interfere with the property and other interests of the company. The investigation was brought by chiefs of railway labor unions, who asked for a modification of the judge's order because they deemed it too sweeping and illegal in its requirements.

Some of the discussions between the lawyers and Judge Jenkins were sharply accented. The case, as stated by the judge, is thus defined: He does not object to men quitting work if they do so with a view of severing their connections with their employers, but he is opposed to men ceasing work temporarily to gain a certain object and when they have no intention of permanently retiring from the service of their employers. In other words, the celebrated injunctional orders of Judge Jenkins do not restrain the employes of the Northern Pacific Railroad from quitting the service of the receivers, but they do forbid the men from stopping work with a view of compelling the receivers to restore the wages they received under the old schedule, and with the intention of gaining re-employment by the Northern Pacific at a higher rate of pay than they now receive.

Attorney Harper, for the chiefs, in the course of his argument, remarked that the liberties of the people must be carefully guarded. The English law, which the American courts follow, was very careful about guarding such rights. Here it was the right of the men to loaf or to work, as they pleased, and the court could not interfere with it. If they had not lived up to a contract it would be different. But the receivers had not asked to have them compelled to live up to a contract; they had simply asked to have them restrained from striking.

"What do you mean by striking?" demanded the court.

"Striking?"

"Yes."

"It is simply a quitting of work."

"No, sir. It is a quitting for the purpose of enforcing certain conditions," replied Judge Jenkins. "And it is in that respect like a lockout, where an employer locks out his men, not to keep them from working, but to compel them to work for certain wages."

A heated discussion followed.

Mr. Quarles, also for the chiefs, at one point in his plea insisted that the men had the right to combine to force a concession and to use their only weapon against oppression, which was their right to quit work.

"The right of the men to quit work has never been denied by this court," exclaimed Judge Jenkins, with great warmth. "If the men want to quit work and go to Texas, they may quit individually or collectively, or as they please."

"That is all we want," said one of the labor leaders in the back of the room.

"But that is not what they want to do," continued the court. "They do not really want to quit, that is the trouble."

"But you have enjoined us from quitting if we embarrass the receivers by so doing," said Mr. Quarles.

"If they want to go to Texas they may all quit," said the court, "because there are any number of men who will be glad to take their places."

Later Mr. Quarles read the following definition of a strike, furnished by Grand Chief Clark, of the Order of Railroad Conductors, and concurred in by the other chiefs:

> A strike is a concerted cessation of or refusal to work until or unless certain conditions which obtain or are incident to the terms of employment are changed. The employe declines to longer work, knowing full well that the employer may immediately employ another to fill his place, also knowing that he may or may not be re-employed or returned to service. The employer has the option of acceding to the demand and returning the old employes to service, of employing new men, or offering conditions under which the old men are glad to return to service under the old conditions.

Colonel John H. McNaught opened the argument for the receivers. He said that the writs were not intended to limit the right of the men to quit. Mr. McNaught said he knew the orders did not prevent the men from quitting at any time they should choose, because he wanted that provision put into the injunction, but Judge Jenkins would not go as far as he (McNaught) had wanted. There were about 12,000 employes, on the Northern Pacific, and of this number about 9,000 belonged to labor organizations. In the United States there were 821,000 railway employes, and seventy-five per cent of them belonged to the organizations. It could thus be seen that the railways were at the mercy of these unions. Not only the railways, but the peace and prosperity of the country were held in the hands of these men, who could delay and impede traffic according to their whims and caprices.

Further on he said that RAILROAD MEN HAD A GREAT DREAD OF EXPULSION FROM THEIR LODGE. THEY WERE MORE LOYAL TO THE RAILWAY LABOR CHIEFS THAN THEY WERE TO THE RECEIVERS.

And this is the solid truth about every man who belongs to one of these iron-clad, oath-bound secret societies.

The court took the case under advisement.

If the views of Judge Jenkins are sustained by the higher courts, it is thought that no more strikes can occur in the United States.

MAYOR HOPKINS AND THE MASONS.

On Wednesday of last week the Inter Ocean made this positive statement:

> In his zeal to fill all places in the City Hall with "suitable Democratic substitutes," Mayor Hopkins has caused to be discharged a number of Masons of high degree. The well-known enmity of the papists towards this society gives color to the statement made yesterday by a prominent Mason, that all who belong to that or any other Protestant order are doomed.

In proof of its statement the Inter Ocean of March 7 prints the names of two Knights Templar and six 32 degree Masons whom the Mayor had discharged. These men held important positions in the city service. Some of them had been employed by the city for more than twenty years.

It is well-known that Mayor Hopkins is a Roman Catholic, and a member of several secret societies especially fostered by the Church of Rome, among which, it is alleged, is the murderous Clan-na-Gael.

The Inter Ocean, in the same issue, says: "There is a well-organized protest being formed among the Masons, who naturally feel considerably aggrieved at the turn affairs are taking at the City Hall. One of them said: 'Beyond the shadow of a doubt Mayor Hopkins intends to cut out every member of my society now in the city's employ. Nothing has been done openly, but the quiet tip has gone around that every Mason may expect his discharge.... The Mayor has no reason for discharging members of any secret society, except that they are of necessity Protestants. I think.... the public ought to know why they are being discriminated against; and I am prepared to prove the wholesale slaughter of that order to which I have referred.'"

In its issue of last Thursday the Inter Ocean recorded the discharge of two other city employes —both Masons. "They have been discharged from positions long held by them, in pursuance, it is said, with the anti-secret society policy of Mayor Hopkins."

The issue of the Inter Ocean for March 9 quotes the expression of a prominent alderman from a West Side ward, a member of Oriental Consistory (32d degree), and also of St. Bernard Commandery, K. T., who, about a month ago, pointing to his signet-ring, bearing Masonic emblems, said: "All who wear this ring must go!" The result has justified the prediction. "Quietly, but effectually, the ax has been applied through all the departments of the city's government. The snicker-snee has fallen upon Democrats and Republicans alike, and in the harvest of garnered heads the number of them owned by Masons has caused a genuine outburst of righteous indignation among the members of that non-sectarian, non-political body." Thus quoth the Inter Ocean.

An afternoon paper prints an interview, in which Mayor Hopkins is made to say that the Masons removed were ousted for "political reasons," and that he had appointed four Masons to office. Masons deny any knowledge that the Mayor's appointees are Masons. "They certainly are not members of the order known to prominent men in the fraternity, and their appointments are not considered by us as a compliment to the order." So said Recorder Ward of the St. Bernard Commandery. Masons generally understand that their "brethren" in public offices must "go."

Taking the statements printed in the Inter Ocean as the expressions of genuine Freemasons, the situation in the case is this: Mayor Hopkins belongs to a church which professes to oppose secret societies, but limits its opposition to that class whose members, or a majority of them, are not subject to its control; who do not worship with it, or confess their transgressions to its ministry. Nearly all other secret societies are recognized as in affiliation with the church. The Freemasons stand almost alone in its maledictions. Hence it is not so remarkable that in a city which embraces in its municipal government the following members of the Roman Catholic church should seek to oust Freemasons, however capable and faithful to the public interests, to make room for more Catholic office-holders: The Mayor, Chief of Police, Chief of the Fire Department, State's Attorney, clerks of the Circuit, Probate and Superior Courts, a number of the judges, forty-five of the sixty-eight aldermen, ninety-five per cent of the police force, and sixty-seven per cent of the school teachers.

It is noticeable, also, that one of the prominent Masons who were interviewed by representatives of the Inter Ocean concerning the action of the Mayor, thus expressed himself: "It is foreign to Masonry to pay attention to attacks either from within or without. Masonry is in no sense a political institution.....It is but natural, however, that members of any fraternity will seek the cause of an overt attack upon any of its members."

Yet it seems to be well understood, from the various obligations of Freemasonry, and the practices of Freemasons, that whenever a Mason is a candidate for public office, and his opponent is not a Mason, that the Masons will give the preference, so far as their votes and influence are concerned, to their affiliate; to this extent, at least, Masonry is "a political institution," and partisan, although its members may, or may not belong, ostensibly, to any of the current political factions. They are not allowed to discuss political questions in the lodge-room, but it is an easy matter for them to "button-hole" each other in the ante-room in favor of their particular preferences.

THE ACQUITTAL OF COUGHLIN.

On Thursday evening of last week the jury in the second trial of Dan Coughlin for participation in the murder of Dr. P. H. Cronin, in 1889, returned a verdict of "not guilty."

The trial has occupied the attention of Judge Tuthill and the jury for about four months, at a cost to the taxpayers of Cook county of probably not less than $100,000. Over 100 witnesses were called for and against the prosecution, and the most searching sifting of the evidence on both sides was made. Especial features of the trial will force themselves upon the public mind. The case grew out of an overt act by the secret society of the Clan-na-Gael. That actwas the murder of Dr. Cronin for an offence committed against the Clan-na-Gael, and sufficient evidence was gathered at the first trial to implicate the men convicted for his murder as the instruments of that society.

Those who were convicted were sentenced to the penitentiary for life, leaving the impression upon the public that they were guilty and deserving, at the very least, of the punishment meted out to them. Two died in prison. Coughlin was remanded for a new trial by the Supreme Court of the State, after having served his time as a convict for several years.

When the new trial began, counsel agreed that it should be that of a man accused of murder, and not an inquisition of the Clan-na-Gael. This understanding was mutually adhered to during the trial; and, once or twice, when the testimony of witnesses tended to implicate the Clan or other members of it, such reference was barred out of the record.

The jury was chosen with great caution by both the prosecution and the defense; and it was believed that they would faithfully and impartially try the case according to the evidence and the law presented. The public had no reason to doubt their integrity as jurors. The Judge, throughout, apparently maintained a dignified, wise and impartial bearing.

Very much of the evidence brought before the court was direct, the testimony of persons who had been more or less conversant with the details of the murder, and their intelligence manifestly impressed the jury with a sense of its importance. But there was this fault in the evidence—a peculiarity that must have struck the judge, the jury and the auditors with its incongruity. That was its contradictory character. In very many instances the testimony of witnesses was widely divergent, indicating the crime of perjury. This indication was not inferential; it was positive, as the reported statements and the court record will show. Probable incidents related by one witness and corroborated by others, were met, point-blank, by denials from later witnesses. Every effort was made on both sides to confuse and destroy the evidence presented by each. This was the grand distinguishing feature of the entire trial, but one to be expected under the maneuvering of a malignant secret organization.

The press and the public generally were evidently in the belief that a bribery of the jurors was not attempted by friends of either the prosecution or the defense, and a general confidence in their integrity was apparently cherished.

As for the attorneys on both sides, with the exception of one who was summarily dismissed from the prosecution by the court for overstepping the prerogatives of his profession, they seemed to be devoted to the cause for which they were severally engaged. There was, perhaps, more stringency of interference at times than courtesy could warrant; but on the whole the amenities of the court room were observed by all. The closing arguments in the case were masterpieces of forensic analysis, and were probably marked by no more acerbity than the exigencies of the case required.

The charge of Judge Tuthill to the jury was a calm, deliberate and intelligent series of instructions, which to those who heard it carried the impress of candor and impartiality.

The jury were out about six hours. Their verdict was received with applause by the prisoner and his friends; but to many it was a positive surprise, since evidence of at least partial guilt was not wanting, notwithstanding the attempts of counsel to dissipate it.

Two theories as to the causes of the verdict have been advanced. One is the contradictory character of the evidence introduced. Another is the jurors' fear of trouble from the Clan-na-Gael, if they found the prisoner guilty. It is not unreasonable to believe that either or both theories may be right. In other words, if they were afraid of arousing the ire of the Clan-na-Gael, the contradictions of witnesses gave them a loop-hole through which they could escape the vengeance that might pursue them.

Coughlin is free. The "twilight judgments of this world" have saved him from doom. But is he less guilty in the eyes of God or the people at large? Painter was hanged for murder, here, in February, on evidence not one-fourth as strong as that on which Coughlin was liberated, and died protesting his innocence with a fearful imprecation on his lips. Coughlin lives to wrestle with his conscience and the God of heaven, until the latter shall lay judgment to the line, and righteousness to the plummet, until the hail shall sweep away every refuge of lies.

—Rev. Dr. Parkhurst, by his vigorous attacks upon the municipal mismanagement of New York City, has accomplished wonders in the way of social and political reform, and the downfall of Tammany and misrule is confidently anticipated. At the outset, Tammany, believing itself to be invincible, threw down its challenge: "How can you help yourself?" Dr. Parkhurst has answered the sneer with an energy that makes that unholy alliance tremble, and crime stands aghast at his power.

—On Sunday evening, the 5th instant, in St. Mary's (Roman Catholic) Hall, at Winfield, L. I., New York, a representation of the passion, crucifixion, death, burial and resurrection of Christ was performed in pantomime. About three hundred spectators were present, and the front seats were occupied by Catholic priests. The exhibition was designed to raise money for the decoration of a church, whose priest is absent, and the parsonage attached. It is not so very long since public opinion denounced and prevented a similar shameful and blasphemous exhibition of the "passion play" in New York City; but the city and county were not then, as now, under Roman Catholic domination.

REFORM NEWS.

COLLEGE AGENT IN UTAH AND NEBRASKA.

Omaha, Neb., March 7, 1894.

Dear Cynosure:—On my arrival at Ogden I was interested to find the church formerly served so long and successfully by Rev. and Mrs. Amos Bailey. The present pastor, Rev. F. S. Forbes, invited me to assist in the worship of the next day. I talked a little while in the afternoon, on the temperance question, in the Young People's meeting.

The New West Academy is not an advanced institution, but is a high school for the older children, and without any special library. It was commenced, and has always been, under the control of the "Gentiles," or anti-Mormons.

At Salt Lake City I saw the great Mormon Temple and Tabernacle, which are enclosed within thick stone walls, ten or fifteen feet high, like a penitentiary, and covered with cement and plaster. None but the initiated are allowed to enter the Endowment House, which is the Mormon lodge, contrived by Pres. Joseph Smith under the inspiration of Masonry. Here I visited the University of Utah, formerly Deseret, which is a large and well-endowed State institution. It is under the control of a board of nine Regents, appointed by the Governor of the Territory; and three of these are at this time Mormons. I found the Cynosure in the reading-room; and Pres. J. T. Kingsbury very cordially received our reform literature.

The Mormons have an institution in the city called "the Latter-day Saints' College." As yet it is little more than a Normal, preparing teachers for the children of the "saints." But they are striving to build up a church university, in connection with this college, to teach their system of theology and ethics. The truth is, the "saints" have no other way to retain their young people, who have been attending the excellent schools of the New West Education Society, and so have had their eyes opened to the puerile fancies of Mormondom. It is a common remark here, that the "saints" themselves have changed in their attitude towards the "Gentiles:" they have become more modest and deferential. And I think the prevailing opinion among the people is that, with proper precaution, it would be safe to admit Utah into the Union as a State. But there are some who doubt it.

In Nebraska, which was my next field of labor, Lincoln, the capital city of the State, is the great educational center. At the head of a principal street, and near the business part of the city, stands the University of Nebraska, with its fine lawn and museum, and its large halls. It is doing a notable work, and is an honor to the State. Their motto is "Equal privileges for all." So our anti-secrecy books found a ready place on the shelves of their great library.

Wesleyan University, which is a Methodist Episcopal institution, is located in a suburb, three miles out of the city; but it is reached by the electric cars. It is large, and apparently well-endowed. But they had too many Masons among the trustees, and among the faculty, to allow our reform literature any place in the library. It might inform the students of the selfish combinations and the heathenish oaths which their teachers had taken in pushing their way along in the world. So they politely refused the books.

Cotner University was founded and is sustained by the Disciple church. It is about four miles from the central part of the city, and is connected with it by electric street cars. The dormitory and halls are large and well-arranged; and there appeared to be a crowd of students of both sexes coming and going in the recitation rooms. I had a cordial reception here; and Professor J. A. Beattie, the librarian, assured me that he would be responsible for the books deposited there.

There is yet another great educational light here, said to be five miles out in the suburbs and reached by the electric cars. It is called Union College, and is sustained by the Seventh-day Adventists. The President, Mr. Loughhead, told me, that on the subject of secretism they were fully in accord with us, and would make good use of the reform literature sent to them.

In addition to all this, there are three normal schools, said to be in full operation, in the educational suburbs of Lincoln.

While here, I visited, also, Doane College, at Crete, twenty miles or so from they city, which is a Congregational institution. Prof. Jillson and Prof. Fairchild are earnest reformers, and gave me a hearty God-speed in my work. Our books, and other reform literature, sent them wil be faithfully utilized.

Creighton College is located at Omaha and has, in another part of the city, a medical annex; but both are under the control of the Jesuits, with a nunnery and other fixtures of the Italian church.

Very respectfully, S. F. Porter.

THE PACIFIC COAST.

WHAT THE PEOPLE SAY ABOUT US

It is pleasant to know that our weak efforts are appreciated. If any one needs encouragement i is the reformer.

Some think it will puff us up if anything favor able is said. Not so; an the other hand, it strengthens us and causes us to take courage.

For the good of our cause, and not for myself, I append a few commendations of friends.

Bishop Dillon, D.D , of Salem, Oregon, says Feb. 8, 1894:

"This certifies that Rev. P. B. Williams is a regularly ordained minister in good standing in the church of the United Brethren in Christ. I have known him personally for a number of years, and can recommend him to the good treatment of Christians everywhere. He is able, also, in advocating the reforms of the church."

"Mount Tabor, Oregon, Feb. 8, 1894.—I hereby take pleasure in introducing and recommending the bearer, Elder P. B. Williams, to the public generally. Having known him personally for over four years, I can say that his character is above reproach. As a minister of the Gospel he is clean, straight, pure and loving. He assisted me in a two-weeks' revival last winter, in our church at this place, giving the very best satisfaction to the whole church, as well as myself. He also delivered three lectures in our church, last summer; subjects: Worldly Conformity, and Prohibition and Secrecy, all of which we heartily endorse. May God prosper him, and raise up others also who will prosecute this line of work until the sin and blighting curse of worldly conformity, intemperance and lodgeism of every kind and character be driven from the church, at least.

"T. H Organ,
"Alwilda Organ.
"Pastors Wesleyan Methodist church."

"To Whom it may Concern:—This is to certify that Rev. P. B. Williams, of Philomath, Oregon, is lecturing under the auspices of the National Christian Association. He lectured twice at the United Brethren church of this city to fair audiences who listened with marked attention. His first address was on Intemperance; his last on Secret Societies. "M. B. Bridgeman,
"Dayton, Wash., Feb. 14. 1894, pastor."

"Colfax, Wash., Feb. 16, 1894.—I hereby certify that Rev. P. B. Williams, of Oregon Conference, is personally known by me. His Christian deportment is untrammeled. His efforts as a preacher and reform lecturer are worthy the patronage of all. Any person will be well pleased if they hear him on the subject of moral reform. "M. C. Pearson, Pastor.

[Here follows the letter of Rev. J. A. Kenoyer. P. E. of Palouse District, Walla Walla Conference, U. B. in Christ, which was printed in the Cynosure of March 8.—Editor Cynosure]

"Editor Conservator, Dayton, Ohio:—Last Monday night, Rev. P. B. Williams, pastor of Philomath circuit, Oregon Conference, delivered one of his famous anti-secrecy lectures here, to a large audience. Many of the devotees of the lodge were present, and the lecturer showed, in a masterly way, the shameful failure of the lodges' boasted benevolence. It was a crushing blow upon all the lodges of which I have any knowledge, especially upon the F. & A. M., the I. O. O F. and A. O. U. W. He showed, in a logical manner, that the lodge system of this country is diametrically against the family, the state, and the church. The conclusion of all present (without bias) is that the lecture was a grand success, and that such a plan of work will result in great good to the cause of human liberty. God bless and keep these reformers, as well as the reforms, moving on. Let all who read these few lines pray that righteousness and equity may be brought forth, so that the people may come to see the benefits of the Christian system of salvation, as wrought out in the life and death of the Son of God. "Henry L. Barkley, P.E.
"Salem District, Oregon Conf."

More anon, P. B. Williams.

The Home.

ONLY.

Only a word for the Master,
Lovingly, quietly said,
Only a word!
Yet the Master heard,
And some fainting hearts were fed.

Only a look of remonstrance,
Sorrowful, gentle, and deep,
Only a look,
Yet the strong man shook,
And he went alone to weep.

Only some act of devotion,
Willingly, joyfully done.
"Surely 'twas naught!"
(So the proud world thought),
But yet souls for Christ were won.

Only an hour with the children,
Pleasantly, cheerfully given,
Yet seed was sown
In that hour alone
Which will bring forth fruit for heaven!

"Only." But Jesus is looking Constantly, tenderly down
To earth, and sees
Those who strive to please;
And their love he loves to crown.

A HIGHLAND COMMUNION.

In these days when the adaptation of art and invention to the needs of Christian worship sometimes robs it of its simplicity and purity, Mr. A. Fraser Robertson's account of "A Highland Communion" reads like a story of the old Covenanters. It was when tramping across the moors of Scotland last summer on a Sabbath morning that Mr. Robertson came upon an impressive sight.

He was first attracted toward a brown ridge of moor, purple with heather in early bloom, by the sound of singing faintly floating through the air. There, beneath him, on reaching the summit of the hillock, he saw an open-air Highland communion. On a green plateau, somewhat beneath the level of the moor, they had spread the simple feast. Nothing more absolutely solitary than the spot chosen could well have been imagined. Save for the whitewashed church, standing at the junction of the cross-roads, distant about a stone's throw, there was hardly a human dwelling in sight. Sloping brown hillocks, forming a sort of natural amphitheater, rose from the green flat. On the sides of these, and clustering densely about the table, was gathered a congregation, numbering something like a thousand souls. Some sat on wooden forms. Here and there appeared a camp stool, but for the most part they simply squatted on the green grass. It was a picture dear to the Scottish heart, such as has been preserved to us in paintings, which yet strive feebly to convey the original. Just so might our fearless covenanting forefathers have met in fugitive conventicle two hundred years ago, on moor or plain—in dens and caves of the earth—liable at any moment to the rude interruption of their persecutors.

The central feature of the picture was a long white-covered table, with wooden forms running down each side. At one end of this, placed at right angles to it, stood a rough wooden cupboard, on which were placed two pewter cups and a plate holding the sacred elements. A rude covered box, open at one side, did duty as a shelter for the various speakers. Such were all the simple preparations. Round about the table, in a dense semi-circle, sat the people. There were old and young, hale and feeble. But for the most part they were old—old women with black shawls and black bonnets and neat white lappets, shading wrinkled, weather-beaten faces, and dark, earnest eyes; old men with bare heads and floating, white hair, bent shoulders and uncertain step. Some of the frailest had literally to be helped to the table, and tottered as they walked. But, to them, their very feebleness was the strongest plea for their being there. The nearer they found themselves to the end of life's appointed span, the more urgent seemed to them the call to the Sacrament. Not a few of these old bodies had been jolted in carts over rough roads for distances of ten and fifteen miles. One shuddered to think how the feeble frames must have suffered had it been cold or inclement weather. But the day was mercifully fine, neither too powerful sunshine nor wind. There were patches of brilliant color made here and there by tartan plaids and shawls and colored wrappings, and on every face was an expression of profound reverence.

About fifty sat down to the table at a time. Then the elders moved down each side collecting the "tokens." The minister came out of the extemporized pulpit and said a few words in Gaelic, placing the elements on the table, and these were passed slowly down from top to bottom.

During the actual communion the minister stood forward, and, with uncovered head, addressed the people. He had abundant gesture and a sing-song, rather monotonous voice, but he spoke well out. His attitude seemed to me, perhaps, denunciatory rather than conciliatory. It may have been that, in his opening remarks, he was following the ancient Scottish custom of "fencing the tables." But looking round on the upturned, earnest faces, one was fain to hope that he was imparting to these poor souls—many of them evidently weary and heavy-laden—something of the love of the Gospel rather than of the rigor of the law. When the minister had spoken for about fifteen minutes, he gave out the Psalm. An old precentor, with gray, uncovered head, stepped forward and chanted the first line, after which the people took it up, and repeated it. It is almost impossible to convey the effect produced. No one who has not heard it for himself can hope to realize it—the inexpressible thrill that ran through one as the wild, plaintive melody rose and fell on the air. There was the thin, pathetic quaver of age, dragging behind here and there. Then a man's deep, mellow bass, and mingling with these the clear, carolling note of some young girl rising easily on the still air. Again, a line by the precentor alone, and again the united voice of the congregation in the old Scottish tunes dear to the Scottish heart. The effect was a little short of overpowering.—Literary Digest.

EXQUISITE HAPPINESS.

Since Monday I have been excluding myself almost entirely from my prayers, and filling them with the wants of others. I never had such views of Christ's love for his people, and his intense willingness to heal their backslidings and crown them with loving-kindness; nor have I ever been more conscious of sympathy with him than in thus giving myself up to their concerns. "Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others." I have asked God to answer upon others all the prayers I have been offering up for myself hereto. What is sanctification? What but love? Surely, this is the way to make progress in holiness—to be forgetting self and remembering others. Paul seems to have had little to do with prayer for himself, but was ever entreating the churches to pray for him that his mouth might be opened. While he prays that the Ephesians may know the love of Christ, he adds, with all saints, directing their desires to the interests of others. There is exquisite happiness in praying for saints, when we realize the love of Christ for them.—Rev. Geo. Bowen.

FRANKLIN AND THE SKEPTICS.

We are told that during Dr. Benjamin Franklin's residence in Paris he was invited to a company embracing many of the courtiers, and of the distinguished men who signalized the age in which they lived by their learning and their skepticism. According to their custom, in a free and promiscuous conversation, Christianity was the great topic, and the Bible was treated with unsparing severity. Growing warmer, and more profane in their comments, one of the company attracted universal attention by asserting, with great confidence, that the Bible was not only a piece of gross deception, but totally devoid of literary merit. With the exception of Franklin, the entire company seemed to give a hearty consent to the sentiment. Being at the time a general favorite, his companions were disquieted by even a tacit reproof from a man of his might and influence. They all appealed to him for his opinion. He replied, in his own peculiar manner, that he was hardly prepared to give them a suitable answer, as his mind had been running on the merits of a book which he thought of rare excellence, and which he had happened to find in one of the Paris book-stores; and as they had made allusion to the literary character of the Bible, perhaps it might interest them to compare the merits of his own prize with that old volume. If so, he would read them a few sentences. All were eager to have him proceed, and give them something from his rare book. He then opened it, and with much gravity of manner, and with propriety of utterance, read to them the words: "God came from Teman, and the Holy One from Mount Paran. His glory covered the heavens, and the earth was full of his praise. His brightness was as the light. He had horns coming out of his hands, and there was the hiding of his power. He stood and measured the earth; he beheld and drove asunder the nations. The everlasting mountains were scattered; the perpetual hills did bow. His ways are everlasting." These few sentences made a deep impression. The admiring listeners pronounced them superior to anything they had heard or read; and that nothing could surpass them in grandeur and sublimity. They all wished to know what was the name of this new work, the name of its author, and whether this was a specimen of its merits? "Certainly, gentlemen," said Dr. Franklin, smiling at his triumph, "my book is full of such passages; it is your good-for-nothing Bible. I have read you a short paragraph from the prayer of the prophet Habakkuk."—The Christian Steward.

THE FULLNESS OF LOVE.

God is waiting to give to all souls the fullness of that love which is in Christ. We are to ask; we have the ability to do this, though the disposition may not be as yet intense. But we should not wait for this. Let us ask now, as we are, and with what measure of desire that we may now have.

For what shall we ask? Let us ask for a complete victory over our personal weaknesses, for the uplifting of our souls to a new plane of peace and power, for a faith that will be equal to all our circumstances of trial, and for the ability to discern the truth as God would have us know it.

This asking depends not so much upon our words as upon the spirit of obedience to him ruling our hearts. When we lie low at our Master's feet, willing to part with all for him, ready to do whatever he commands, saying continually: "Lord, here am I," then there will come upon our souls the spirit of true prayer for the divine fullness.

It is the office of the Holy Spirit to maintain in our souls the prayer for fullness of love. This is a great office. This is a wondrous gift for the soul in the midst of life's struggles and temptations. We need not doubt the ability and willingness of the Comforter to do all this. He will give us irrepressible longings for the full knowledge of Jesus, first by showing us the turpitude of sin, and then by revealing the saving efficacy of Jesus' merit.

What will follow when this great blessing rests upon the universal church? The church will then grow in power as the one leading agency to influence the unbelieving world. God calls Zion to occupy this place in every community. It is not right that she should exist anywhere as the feeblest of all organizations. Rather, it is for the church to be the most influential of all instruments in society—supporting schools of learning; enshrining herself in the hearts of all; arresting social evils; encouraging the spirit of liberty, justice, equality and benevolence everywhere.

"Come, Holy Spirit, heavenly-dove,
With all thy quickening powers;
Come, shed abroad a Saviour's love,
And that shall kindle ours."

—Indian Witness.

NECESSITY OF OBEDIENCE.

"When we refuse to obey a command we refuse to do what the Lord himself commands. We are to act rightly because Jesus commands us, and we love to do his pleasure; there can be no friendship without this. Oh, for grace to serve the Lord with gladness. To close this first point, it appears that our Lord would have us obey him out of a friendly spirit. Obedience to Christ as if we were forced to do it under pains and penalties would be of no value as a proof of friendship; every one can see that. He speaks not of slaves, but of friends; he would not have us perform duties from fear of punishment or love of reward; that which he can accept of his friends must be the fruit of love. His will must be our law because his person is our delight. Some professors need to be whipped to their duties; they must hear stirring sermons, and attend exciting meetings, and live under pressure; but those who are Christ's friends need no spur but love. The love of Christ constraineth us. When duty becomes delight and precepts are as sweet as promises, then are we Christ's friends, and not till then."—Rev. Chas. Spurgeon.

THE DEPTHS OF THE BIBLE.

I am glad there is a depth in the Bible I know nothing about, says Mr. Moody; that there is a height there I cannot climb to if I should live to be as old as Methuselah; I venture to say if I should live for ages on the earth I would only have touched its surface.

I pity the man who knows all the Bible for it is a pretty good sign he doesn't know himself. A man came to me with what he thought was a very difficult passage, and said, "Mr. Moody, how do you explain it?"

I said, "I don't explain it."

"But how do you interpret it?"

"I don't interpret it."

"Well, how do you understand it?"

"I don't understand it."

"But what do you do with it?"

"I don't do anything with it."

"You don't believe it?"

"Yes, I believe it. There are lots of things I believe that I do not understand. In the third chapter of John, Jesus says to Nicodemus, 'If you do not understand earthly things, how can you understand heavenly things?' There are a great many things about my own body I do not understand; I don't understand nature; it is filled with wonderful things I don't comprehend. Then why should I expect to know everything spiritually?" But men ask, "How can you prove the book is inspired?" I answer, Because it inspires me. That is one of the best proofs. It does inspire us.—Bible Reader.

A SILENCER.

When Whitelock was about to embark as Cromwell's envoy to Sweden, in the year of 1655, he was very much disturbed in mind as he rested in Harwich on the preceding night, which was very stormy, while he reflected on the distracted state of the nation. A confidential servant slept in an adjacent bed, who, finding that his master could not sleep, said:

"Pray, sir, will you give me leave to ask you a question?"

"Certainly."

"Pray, sir, don't you think God governed the world very well before you came into it?"

"Undoubtedly."

"And pray, sir, don't you think he will govern it quite as well when you are gone out of it?"

"Certainly."

"Then, sir, pray excuse me, but don't you think you may as well trust him to govern it as long as you are in it?"

To this question Whitelock had nothing to reply, and, turning about, soon fell asleep.—Anonymous.

THINK BEFORE YOU STRIKE.

I remember reading in my boyhood about a merchant traveling on horseback, accompanied by his dog. He dismounted for some purpose, and accidentally dropped his package of money. The dog saw it, the merchant did not. The dog barked to stop him, and, as he rode farther, bounded in front of the horse and barked louder and louder. The merchant thought he had gone mad, drew a pistol from his holster and shot him. The wounded dog crawled back to the package, and when the merchant discovered his loss and rode back, he found his dog dying there guarding the treasure.

The following little story, told by a friend of mine, is not as painful, but adds force to the thought, "Think before you strike any creature that cannot speak."

"When I was a boy and lived up in the mountains of New Hampshire, I worked for a farmer, and was given a span of horses to plough with, one of which was a four-year-old colt. The colt, after walking a few steps, would lie down on the furrow. The farmer was provoked, and told me to sit on the colt's head to keep him from rising, while he whipped him 'to break him of that notion,' as he said.

"But just then a neighbor came by. He said: 'There is something wrong here; let him get up and let us examine.' He patted the colt, looked at his harness, and then said: 'Look at this collar; it is so long and narrow, and carries the harness so high, that when he begins to pull it slips back and chokes him so he can't breathe.' And so it was; and but for that neighbor we should have whipped as kind a creature as we had on the farm, because he laid down when he could not breathe."

It was only the other day I heard of a valuable St. Bernard dog being shot, because, having a wound on his head concealed by the hair, he bit a person who handled him roughly.

Boys, young and old, please remember that these creatures are dumb. They may be hungry or thirsty, or cold, or faint, or sick, or bruised, or wounded and cannot tell you. Think before you strike any creature that cannot speak.—Geo. T. Angell.

GEMS.

"GIVE US THIS DAY OUR DAILY BREAD."

Behind the bread the snowy flour,
Behind the flour the mill;
Behind the mill the growing wheat
Nods on the breezy hill;
Over the wheat is the glowing sun
Ripening the heart of the grain;
Above the sun is the gracious God,
Sending the sunlight and the rain.

—E. H. G., in the Sabbath Outlook.

A LITTLE BOY'S LOVE.

With shouts of laughter
That followed after,
This forfeit made its stern behest;
"Kneel to the prettiest,
Bow to the wittiest,
And kiss the one you love the best."

"Come, choose her boldly,"
They cry, but coldly
He turns from all the maidens there,
To bow—and lingers
To kiss her fingers,
While kneeling at his mother's chair.

TEMPERANCE.

TIPPLING AMONG YOUNG MEN.

The great majority of those who are enslaved by strong drink did not begin their career of self-destruction in the dram shops. While the lower classes of drunkards are victims of saloons, the more respectable sort began with the social glass. It was at the social party, or in the billiard room, or the club, or at the wedding that the fatal habit was formed. Not many begin to drink alone, or from sheer appetite for stimulants. The glass was offered them by somebody, and from want of moral courage or from a desire to appear "gentlemanly," they consent to drink.

I was once at a wedding in a "genteel" circle of society where the popping of champagne corks was like the rattle of musketry. Within a few years I met the oldest son in that family a confirmed drunkard. His parents had tempted other people's sons and had ruined their own! The man who sets a decanter on his table sets a trap for his boys that may land them in perdition. The young lady who offers any intoxicant to her young gentleman friends deserves to become that wretched object, a drunkard's wife.

The drinking usages are sadly on the increase in this country—in social life, at restaurants, at clubs and even in the fashionable shopping resorts for ladies! While the chief discussion is about prohibiting saloons Satan is stealing a march on us by tempting young men to be tipplers. The only safeguard for any young man—even though he be a professing Christian—is entire abstinence. He never knows what latent appetite he may have within until the spark touches the gunpowder. A young man of my acquaintance (a church member) found, before he was aware, that he was becoming a slave to the habit. He said to me: "My young friends invite me to drink and are ruining me. After this when they ask me to drink I shall knock them down!" He was terribly in earnest; and no wonder—he had been playing with vipers at the mouth of hell!

For two reasons every conscientious young man ought to pledge to total abstinence. First, for his own sake, for he don't know how soon he may become a tippler. Secondly, for the sake of others whom he may tempt to ruin by his example. Let Dr. Keeley, or any other man who is making money by "cures for drunkenness," say what they will, the reform of inebriates is difficult and rare. The one time to stop drinking treacherous intoxicants is to stop before you begin.—T. L. Cuyler, D.D.

PLAIN FACTS,

Christian dollars built and now own 139,832 churches.

Christian ballots built and now control 40,000 saloons.

Church vows license 163,787 ministers.

Church votes license 500,000 owners and tenders of saloons.

Dollars annually paid the American pulpit, $20,000,000.

Dollars annually paid the American saloon, $1,200,000,000.

Christian ballots permit the saloon to earn sixty times more money than the ministers earn.

For every dollar that Christians put into the hands of Christ to save men, the church ballot puts sixty dollars in the hands of the devils to damn them.—Issue.

PLENTY OF MONEY FOR LIQUOR.

The times are hard. Many people are out of work, because manufacturers have been obliged to discharge numerous hands or have closed their establishments altogether. The consequence is great suffering to many families. All lines of business are affected. Business men generally complain of diminished sales and small profits. Yet there is one class of business men who appear to be but little affected by the hard times—those engaged in the liquor traffic. Investigations in different cities show that the quantity of liquor consumed right along is enormous. The city of Worcester, Mass., contains a population of 85,000 people. In that city are found eighty saloons, which pay a total sum of $118,000 for licenses and $64,000 for rents, and during the past year sold liquor to the enormous amount of $1,200,000; that is, each saloon received on an average $50 a day. Where did this money come from? Largely from the laboring class, and this is the class that is suffering mostly from the hard times.

In our city of Reading, we have nearly 200 places where intoxicating liquors are sold. The license fee is $500, which makes a total of about $100,000 for fees alone. Not only have applications been made for all the present stands, but also for some new ones. No failures have occurred among this class of business men, and the business appears to be prosperous. Here, as elsewhere, the saloons are supported mainly by the working classes. Thank God, not all workingmen are drinkers! Thousands of them are among the most exemplary citizens. Yet it is easy to see what a drain are the saloons upon the community. It has been stated that in this city more money is spent for liquor than for bread, and the statement is no doubt correct. This state of things will go far to explain the cause of the existing destitution in very many cases.—Reformed Church Record.

FROM A LABOR PAPER.

Wherever prohibition has been given a trial, sustained by public sentiment and enforced by honest officials, there has been a marked improvement in the condition of the people. Newspapers controlled by liquor interests are ever ready to proclaim that there is more drunkenness in Kansas under the prohibitory law than there ever was under license. The testimony of two governors and one of the leading papers of that State (published elsewhere) would seem to tell a very different story. A decrease in the number of arrests for drunkenness and crime during the past year of over eighty per cent is the very best refutation of the slander. Prohibition in Kansas has become a fixture, and no political party there has the nerve to even agitate the question of re-submission to the people. This is in part accounted for by the fact that in Kansas those who are the greatest sufferers from the curse of intemperance—the women—are permitted to vote, and nine-tenths of them vote one way on the issue between the home and the saloon.—Journal of United Labor.

BIBLE LESSON.

Points of Interest.—Angels going toward Sodom; Abraham's five intercessions for Sodom; the Lord and Abraham go their ways. Central Truth.—The godly are the salt of the earth.

LESSON VIII.—Trial of Abraham's Faith.—Gen. 22: 1–13. Golden Text.—By faith Abraham, when he was tried, offered up Isaac.—Heb. 11: 17. Points of Interest.—God commands Abraham to sacrifice Isaac; the journey to Mt. Moriah; the sacrifice prepared; God interferes to save Isaac, and provides another sacrifice. Central Truth.—It is always safe to obey God.

LESSON IX.—Selling the Birthright.—Gen. 25: 27–34. Golden Text.—The life is more than meat, and the body is more than raiment.—Luke 12: 23. Points of Interest.—Different characters of Jacob's two sons; how each was esteemed by their parents; Jacob's artifice; the birthright sold for a mess of pottage. Central Truth.—Our title to heaven should not be bartered for earthly things.

LESSON X.—Jacob at Bethel.—Gen. 28: 10–22. Golden Text.—Behold I am with thee, and will keep thee.—Gen. 28: 15. Points of Interest.—Jacob's journey from Beer-sheba toward Haran; he sleeps at Bethel; his dream of the ladder and angels; awakes awe-stricken; anoints a memorial pillar, and consecrates himself to the service of God. Central Truth.—There is nothing so sweet and so helpful as communion with God and consecration to his service.

LESSON XI.—Wine is a Mocker.—Prov. 20: 1–7. Golden Text.—Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging; and whosoever is deceived thereby is not wise.—Prov. 20: 1. Points of Interest.—Solomon, the wisest of monarchs, warns us against intemperance. Central Truth.—Total abstinence is the only sure deliverance from the drunkard's doom.

LITERATURE.

CURRENT PERIODICALS.

The Review of Reviews for March lacks neither its usual variety or interest, either in art-specimens or letter-press. The original papers include Childs, the Giver, a character-sketch, with portraits and other illustrations, of the late Geo. W. Childs; A New Constitution for the State of New York, with portraits of delegates-at-large; Emergency Relief at Washington; Dr. Theodore Billroth, Germany's famous surgeon, with a portrait and other illustrations; The Story of the World's Parliament of Religions, by Rev. F. Herbert Stead, with portraits; Miss Clara Barton and the Red Cross, with a portrait. The Progress of the World, a most interesting department, embraces thirty-five topics, with portraits, etc. The Record of Current Events is a valuable summary of the month's doings. Current History in Caricature, as usual, abounds in humor and suggestion. Leading Articles of the Month cover forty-nine social, industrial, scientific, political and miscellaneous papers of an attractive character. These and the usual literary notes complete this "illustrated history of the times." Published at 13 Astor place, New York City. Price, 25 cents.

The Century presents the following papers in its March issue: The Tuileries under the Second Empire, with a portrait of the Empress Eugenie and others; The Great Sympathetic Strike; Gerrard Dou, the Old Dutch Painter; The Fortunate One; A Pilgrimage to Lourdes, illustrated; The Timber Cruiser; Drowsy Kent; Major Andre's Story of the "Mischianza," with portraits, etc.; Isam and the Major; We Camped with Burns; Edvard Greig; The City Tramp, illustrated; The Imagination, by J. Russell Lowell; The Flower of Sorrow; Cœur d'Alene, continued; A Dialogue; The Madison Square Garden, illustrated; A Tribute to Philip Kearny; Earthquakes, and How to Measure Them, with diagrams; The Courting of Jufrow Van Loo, illustrated; Nature and Man; Spring—copy of a fine painting; Pudd'nhead Wilson, by Mark Twain, continued; The Suppression of Bribery in England; the Anti-Catholic Crusade; How Bribery at Elections may be Prevented; The Only Literary Success Worth Having, and the Open Letters and Lighter Vein departments. It is, altogether, an average number. Published by the Century Co., 33 East 17th street, New York.

The Preacher's Magazine for March is the third number of the fourth volume. The leading sermons are entitled The Fellowship of His Sufferings, by Rev. Mark Pearse, and the Resurrection of Jesus, by Rev. Joseph Berry. Rev. F. L. Wiseman writes on Mission Preaching: Its Matter and Methods, and Rev. C. O. Eldridge on Grasping a Thought: Being Pages for Young Preachers. Among the other articles we notice The Blood of Sprinkling, by Rev. Thomas Stephens; The Healthfulness of Religions, by Thain Davidson, D D.; How a Commentator was Made, Being an Interview with Dr. J. Agar Beet; The Senior Editor, Rev. Mark Guy Pearse, continues his article on Moses, writing this month on the Serpent in the Wilderness. The Homiletical Department is complete, several outlines of Easter Sermons being given by distinguished clergymen, Notes on the International Sunday-school Lessons, Outline Addresses on the Golden Texts, and About Books are among various subject headings. The magazine is published monthly at $1.50 per year, single copies 15c. Wilbur B. Ketcham, Publisher, 2 Cooper Union, New York.

Our Day (issue for January-February) present photogravure portraits of Rev. John H. Barrows and Rev. Geo. F. Pentecost. The World's Parliament of Religions is largely treated in Mr. Cook's Boston Monday Lecture, in a review of Rev. Dr. Barrows' "The World's Parliament of Religions," and Rev. Geo. Dana Boardman's Address on the same subject. Papers of general interest on other topics are: Neal Dow's Ninetieth Birthday, by Frances E. Willard; Tropical Africa as a Factor in Civilization, by Cyrus C. Adams; Machine-made Millenniums—a fitting review of the phantasies of Bellamy and George; The New Ship Canals in Europe; Dr. Paton on the Kanaka Labor Trade; Albert Shaw on the Need of an Expert Foreign Service; Dr. McNiece on the Situation in Utah; with editorial notes on current events. Boston and Chicago. Price, 25 cents.

The March number of Worthington's Magazine presents many pleasing features. Mrs. Livermore continues her story of One of the "Forty-niners," and there are new, finely illustrated chapters of Peasant Life in Picardy and of A bolt From a Clear Sky. Other contributions include: A picturesque account of Scenes in the Snake River Valley, by Prof. G. Fred Wright; Are Intellectual Women Lovable? by Junius Henri Browne; Effect of Musical Sounds on the Lower Animals, by Dr. James Weir, Jr.; The Fate of Aaron Burr's Daughter, by Bettie T. Pool; A Good Match, by Dr. F. Blanchard, and The Romance of Finger-Rings, by Jean Shirley. These, with new poetry and the ten well-filled domestic departments, give interest and variety to the current issue. Published by A. D. Worthington & Co., Hartford, Conn. Price, 25 cents.

The Cosmopolitan for March abounds in fine engravings illustrative of the following captivating table of contents: The Son of the Carpenter, by Lyman Abbott; The Hemlock; Quadrilles at the Court of Napoleon I.; The Navajo, a poem; The Origin of Thought, a novel; Letters of an Altrurian Traveller, by W. D. Howells; "Bend Low and Hark," a poem; "Buzz;" In the Convent Garden, a poem; The Teachers' College; The Disappearance Syndicate; God's Will and Human Happiness; Transcendance, a poem; The Passing of Spring; In the World of Letters, and The Progress of Science. New York; Price, 15 cents.

RELIGIOUS NEWS.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR.

—The Presbyterian church has 6,000 societies. The Congregationalists are not very far behind with 5,602; the Baptists are next with 3,474; then the Christians and Disciples of Christ with 2,340; the Methodist Episcopal, 1,625; Canadian Presbyterian, 796; Methodist Protestant, 765; Lutheran, 729; Methodist of Canada, 706; Cumberland Presbyterian, 636; Reformed (Dutch) Church in America, 626; Friends, 454; Wesleyan Methodist, 303; United Presbyterian, 302; Evangelical Association, 283; United Brethren, 253; Reformed Church in the United States, 191; Free Baptists, 183; African Methodist Episcopal, 118; Methodist Episcopal, South, 116; Reformed Presbyterian, 79; Church of England in the United States and Canada, 68; Church of God, 63; Reformed Episcopal, 54; Moravian, 54; Seventh-day Baptist, 52; Primitive Methodist, 42; Mennonite, 11, Scotch Presbyterian, 6.

DISSENTERS IN ENGLAND.

—This is the centenary year of the Liberation Society, and it is hoped that it will be a year of legislative fruit grown from the seed sown by the society. A circular has been sent to Nonconformist ministers by the secretaries, calling attention to the centenary, to the rapid spread of sacerdotalism in the Establishment; its steady and often unscrupulous attempts to crush rural Nonconformity, the misrepresentation of the Christian religion by a state Establishment, and the coming introduction of Welsh and Scottish Disestablishment bills. It is suggested that Sunday, May 27, be set apart for especial reference to the fundamental principles of Voluntaryism and Free Churchism. About forty ministers and laymen of different denominations have signed a formal expression of general concurrence in the views set forth in the circular. They think such a simultaneous advocacy of their principles could not fail to impress the public mind, and lead to important practical results.

METHODIST EPISCOPAL.

—Rev. Dr. James M. King, in an article on New York City Methodism in Zion's Herald, says that denomination has 15,959 members in that city, with church property worth $3,921,124; the Protestant Episcopal churches have 37,597 members, and property worth $16,293,000; the Presbyterians, 23,873 members, and property estimated at $8,628,000. The latter denominations he confesses are far in the lead of the Methodists in resources, courage, aggressiveness, and popular efficiency.

—The presiding elders of the Rock River conference held a meeting in Chicago and, after considering invitations from several places, voted unanimously in favor of holding the next session of the conference at Galena.

WORK OF THE SALVATION ARMY.

—The Salvation Army has been bombarding Boston. One night they packed Music Hall with the biggest rally of lads and lassies that New England has ever seen, and in their most enthusiastic way they "fired" successive "vollies." Commander Ballington Booth addressed the crimsoned warriors. He claimed that the Salvation Army had its entrenchments in thirty-seven different nations and countries; that 11,500 commanding officers held 55,000 meetings every week. He allowed that it had some noise about it. He said, "I had much rather see a band of Salvationists than that very much-to-be-pitied procession of Lazaruses going up to the State House to ask for work," and claimed that the Salvation Army could help them. H asserted that the Salvation Army had brought back 56,000 women who were social outcasts. Mrs. Booth spoke and called attention to four women workers in the slums. The "slum lassies" stood up when requested, and Mrs. Booth paid a deserved tribute to their labors, and eulogized woman's work in general. Commander Booth, in an outside-talk, referred to the shelter-brigades established in New York, Buffalo, Chicago, San Francisco and Seattle; that at those headquarters, to the deserving, food, clothing and employment are furnished, He said in the last twelve months 275,000 people had been relieved that way. A shelter brigade for Boston is advised. New England is now taking kindly to the Salvation Army and its noisy peculiarities.

The idolatrous worship of the Masonic lodge is thus clearly seen and understood. Postpaid, 10 cents.

Home and Health.

Clean piano keys with a soft rag dipped in alcohol.

Warm milk used as a wash at night makes hard, coarse, or rough skin soft.

Oranges and lemons will keep well if hung in a wire net in a cool and airy place.

Ripe tomatoes will remove ink and other stains from white cloth; also from the hands.

A drop of oil and a feather will do away with the creaking in a door or a creaking chair.

Take egg stains from silver by rubbing with a wet rag which has been dipped in common table salt.

A little flour dredged over a cake before icing it will keep the icing from spreading and running off.

Ammonia applied two or three times on a fresh cold sore will kill it. It will drive it away if used when the cold sore is first felt.

Beat an egg thoroughly in a bowl and add one teacup of cold water to it. Use enough of this to thoroughly moisten coffee when making it. Keep in a cold place, and waste no more eggs by drying.

Granulated sugar is the purest brand, consequently the cheapest. Do not use quite as much as of other kinds—one-half inch less for a cupfull. Cake batter made with granulated sugar requires longer beating than usual, as the sugar is longer in dissolving.

Belting cloth is a most charming material for table mats, runners and doilies. They will not be durable, but, with proper care, they will last a reasonable period, and embroidered in white floss they are a thing of beauty and a joy—not, indeed, forever, but as long as they do endure.

"March to search" is the old adage. It searches out any weakness of the system, resulting from impure blood. Those who use Ayer's Sarsaparilla find March no more searching or even disagreeable than any other month. This medicine is a wonderful invigorator.

"Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup for Children Teething" softens the gums, reduces inflammation, allays pain and cures wind colic. 25c a bottle.

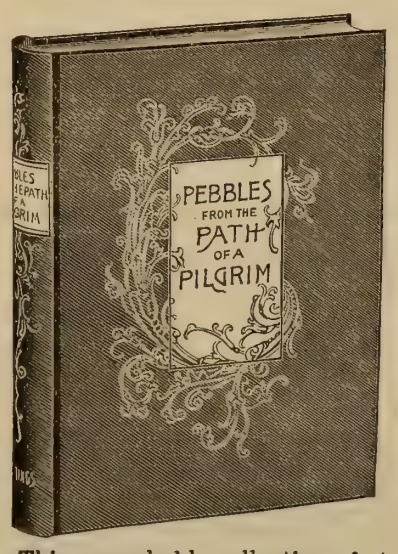
Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: Earnest Christian: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun forgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' said 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'!"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

Talks to Sunday School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Telescope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches it with an earnestness born of conviction.

Scotch Rite Masonry Illustrated. The complete illustrated ritual of the entire Scottish Rite, in two volumes, comprising all the Masonic degrees from 3rd to 33rd inclusive. The first three degrees are common to all the Masonic Rites, and are fully and accurately given in "Freemasonry Illustrated." Vol. I. of "Scotch Rite Masonry Illustrated" comprises the degrees from 3rd to 18th inclusive. Vol. II. of "Scotch Rite Masonry Illustrated" comprised the degrees from 19th to 33rd inclusive, with the signs, grips, tokens and passwords from 1st to 33rd degree inclusive. Price per volume, paper cover, 65 cents each. In cloth, $1.00 each.

Hand-Book of Freemasonry. By E. Ronayne, Past Master of Keystone Lodge No. 639, Chicago. Gives the complete standard ritual of the first three degrees of Freemasonry. New edition, 274 pages. Bound flexible cloth covers. 50 cents.

Freemasonry Exposed. By Capt. William Morgan. The genuine old Morgan book republished. 25 cents each.

Allyn's Ritual of Freemasonry by Avery Allyn contains the fully Illustrated Ritual of the Blue Lodge, Chapter Council and Commandery, 11 of the Scotch Rite Degrees, Several Masonic side degrees and what is termed a Key to the Phi Beta Kappa, the Orange and Odd-fellows Societies. Price in cloth $5.00.

Duncan's Masonic Ritual and Monitor. Profusely illustrated with explanatory engravings, and containing the ritual and work of the order for the seven degrees, including the Royal Arch. Though extensively used as an Instruction Book and one of the best in the market it is not as accurate as "Freemasonry Illustrated" the first book on catalogue. Price in cloth, $2 50.

Richardson's Monitor of Freemasonry. Containing the ceremonies of Lodges, Chapters, Encampments, etc. Illustrated. Although extensively used in conferring the higher degrees, it is not only very incomplete but inaccurate especially as regards the first seven degrees, and as to the higher degrees it gives but a description and general idea of the degrees rather than the full ritual. Price in cloth, $1.25; Paper covers, 75c.

Look to the East. A Ritual of the first three Masonic Degrees by Ralph Lester. Price in cloth $2.00. Notwithstanding the high price this book is very inferior in every way to Freemasonry Illustrated or The Handbook of Freemasonry at a quarter the price.

Ecce Orienti. The Complete Standard Ritual of the First Three Masonic Degrees in Cypher, with complete Floor Charts of Initiating, Passing and Raising a Candidate. Pocket size, Full Roan, Flap, $2.50.

Knights of the Orient. The complete Ritual of the Commandery Masonic Degrees, Knights of the Red Cross, Knight Templar and Knight of Malta, 11th to 13th degrees. Pocket size, full Roan, flap, $2.50.

The Mystic Shrine Illustrated. An Illustrated Ritual of the Nobles of the Mystic Shrine. This is a Side Masonic degree conferred only on Knights Templar and on Thirty-two degree Masons. 15 cts. each.

FARM NOTES.

The estimates of farm animals for January, 1894, compiled by the Department of Agriculture, indicate a decrease in the number of horses, as compared with January, 1893, of a little less than eight-tenths of 1 per cent. There was an increase of mules of about nine-tenths of 1 per cent, an increase in milch cows of nearly four-tenths of 1 per cent, and in oxen and other cattle of a little less than 2 per cent. Sheep, in the interval between these dates, have suffered a numerical loss of nearly 5 per cent, and hogs have fallen off in numbers nearly 2 per cent. Aggregate numbers and values of farm animals are as follows: Horses—Number, 16,081,139; value, $769,224;-799. Mules—Number, 2,352,231; value, $146,232,811. Milch cows—Number, 16,487,400; value, $358,998,661. Oxen and other cattle—Number, 36,608,168; value, $536,789,747. Sheep—Number, 45,048,017; value, $891,186,110. Swine—Number, 45,206,498; value, $270,-384,626.

Wheat in farmers' hands March 1, 1894 (with allowances for underestimates by the government in its reports of the last three wheat crops), quantities eaten, planted and exported being calculated on customary basis, indicates a total so held of 129,000,000 bushels. The significance of this appears when it is learned the calculation indicates there were 204,-000,000 bushels of wheat in farmers' hands March 1, 1893, contrasted with the government total at that time of 135,-000,000 bushels. The government report of the wool clip shows a total of 348,000,000 pounds in 1893, as compared with 333,000,000 pounds the year before, last year's clip being the heaviest on record.

You hear the remark often made that farming don't pay any more, Surely, known facts would indicate the reverse. It seems to me that in the majority of cases it is owing in a great measure to the want of system and plan. Farmers do their business in too much of a hap-hazard way. They are careless in their accounts, not knowing what crops pay or what it costs to keep their stock, losing year by year till at length they lose all.—N. Y. Witness

of the Holy Ghost,
BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by persuing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

"The classification of each of these fifty-two Lessons is excellent. The choicest of Biblical literature has been drawn upon for material to make it one of the very best lesson expositors extant, and in this respect its compilers have achieved flattering success. Its cheapness and its merits entitle it to a general acceptance by Sunday-school workers."—CHRISTIAN CYNOSURE.

WISCONSIN STATE ANTI-SECRECY CONVENTION.

The annual convention of the Wisconsin State Christian Association, opposed to secret societies, will (D. V.) assemble in the Second Free Methodist church, at the corner of Elm and New streets, Oshkosh, on Tuesday evening, March 27, and continue through the next day, March 28. A general invitation is hereby given to all friends of the anti-secrecy reform, in city and country, to be present and earnestly to participate in the proceedings of the convention. Especially let the witnesses for the truth against the lodge system and its evils be in attendance, without fail. The darkness deepens. Let the children of light trim their lamps and come up to the help of the Lord against the mighty. J. B. GALLOWAY, Pres.
ISAIAH FARIS, Sec'y.

WISCONSIN CONVENTION—SPECIAL NOTICE.

Rev. C. V. Hughes, pastor of the church at Oshkosh in which the coming convention is to be held, writes: "Let parties who expect to attend the convention, March 27 and 28, please inform me, at their earliest convenience, so that places can be secured for their entertainment." Pastor Hughes' address is 118 Lincoln avenue, Oshkosh, Wis. The A. P. A. will probably be placed under fire.

New interest is given to our reform work in Pennsylvania by the accession to our ranks of Rev. Anthony S. Shelly, pastor of the Mennonite congregations of Hereford and Upper Milford, who was acting secretary of the recent State convention in Philadelphia. Following the instructions of the convention, he issued the resolutions adopted in circular form, and sent copies to the editors of various religious papers for publication in their columns. Pastor Shelly's address is Bally, Berks county. In addition to sending out these circulars, he and Brother W. B. Stoddard have arranged for holding a series of anti-secrecy meetings at his home, and in that vicinity, from April 5 to 10, and we are expecting encouraging reports of their work.

Bradstreet's latest report shows an increased movement in nearly all staple branches of business, especially in the northern and eastern portions of the country. A larger demand for purchases is felt at the principal distributive centres. The improvement is also felt in the iron trade, and furnaces that have been out of blast for some time past are resuming active operations. The prospect for general business, devoid of speculation, appears to be hopeful.

The Western Catholic News has for two or three weeks past been publishing a list of a thousand or so converts to Rome from the Protestant ranks of the United States. Its records include the work of proselyting for many years. To offset this, we have the word of Bishop Perry, of the Episcopal church, that within his eighteen years' episcopate he has received into the communion of his church 700 adult Roman Catholics. Other Protestant prelates could probably make quite as satisfactory reports. Rome never reports its defections.

Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard's course of lectures against secret societies, recently delivered at Chicago Avenue church, furnished Rev. T. D. Wallace, pastor of the Eighth Presbyterian church of this city, another opportunity to place himself squarely on record in harmony with the anti-secrecy reform in the following letter: "Ironclad, oath-bound secret organizations, with pains and penalties for revealing secret mysteries, I count disloyal to Christ, to home and to the state—a standing perpetual menace to our free institutions, like the infamous power and impious practices of Mormonism, rooted in its secret oaths. The satanic power and shameless, blood-stained record of Jesuitism are the upas-growth out of the same poisoned soil of secret oaths. The treacherous, malign and murderous power of Clan-na-Gaelism is in its secret oaths, against which Cronin's unavenged blood cries even now out of the sewers of our city. God's sunlight in the Gospel of Jesus Christ—the celestial air in the cleansing, transforming, redeeming power of the Holy Ghost—alone can renovate the foulest prison or person. God is light, and in him is no darkness at all. Walk in the light as he is in the light. Read, as a message, Ephesians 5:8–13. Yours till the day dawn, T. D. WALLACE, 205 Warren Avenue." The Cynosure is glad to have so able a coadjutor.

Rev. Dr. Peters, of the Bloomingdale Reformed church, New York City, on a recent Sunday evening, created some stir by his advocacy of the taxation of church property. He introduced statistics showing that the census of 1890 reported in the United States the value of church edifices, the lots on which they stand, and their furnishings, as $680,687,106. This does not include the value of parsonages, colleges, orphanages, land, etc., of which the various churches hold probably $700,000,000 more. The census of 1890 shows that the Catholic estimate of the value of their church edifices alone is $118,342,366. This does not include schools, convents, real estate, or mercantile property, so-called church property. A very careful student of the Catholic church in this country says she has now $250,000,000 worth of property. General Grant, in his famous message to Congress in 1875, was probably not far from right when he said: "In 1900, without a check, it is safe to say this property will reach a sum exceeding $3,000,000,000." "Let Americans," said the speaker, "take warning by the fact that corporated religious wealth became at one time so great in England, and in France, Italy, Spain, and South Germany, that it crippled their resources, paralyzed industries, and produced ambitions which were only alleviated by wholesale confiscation."

One evening last week, in the eleventh ward of Milwaukee, Wis., at a Republican meeting, a Lutheran clergyman, Rev. Mr. Jacobson, of the Norwegian branch of that church, undertook to make a few remarks in English with reference to the United States Constitution. Mr. Rudolph, president of the ward club, and a member of the A. P. A., requested him to speak from the platform. He did so, and referred to the broad spirit of the Constitution, and then said that any man who was a member of the A. P. A. could not be a good citizen. He got no further, for Mr. Rudolph, enraged at the criticism of his organization, jumped to his feet and told the clergyman he could not talk in that manner. John Kurtz, the Republican candidate for alderman in the eleventh ward, moved that the speaker be removed from the platform, and the motion was carried with great applause. After Mr. Jacobson and his friends left, the crowd gave three cheers for Rudolph and Kurtz for the part they had taken in choking off the man who had dared to attack the A. P. A. movement. The Lutherans are naturally indignant at the treatment accorded one of their ministers, and will resent the insult at the polls.

WHERE TWO WAYS MEET IN THE CITY OF BROTHERLY LOVE.

[A paper by Josiah W. Leeds, of Rocouncey, Pa., read at the Pennsylvania Convention opposed to secret societies, Feb. 27, 1894.]

Pleasantly associated with the years of my boyhood—my home being then in that part of the city of Philadelphia which, previous to consolidation, was known as the "Northern Liberties"—was the locality of Franklin Square. Diagonally across from its northwest corner was the old Moravian burying-ground, the surface of the small plat being a few feet above the level of the pave. Here my Aunt Ruth (unremembered by me, except by report as being a sweet Christian woman), was interred, and from thence her crumbling bones were removed, about a dozen years ago, when the plat of ground was sold, and a much-frequented but morally dangerous resort, called "The Carousel," was built on its site. To the merry-go-round came troops of young men and young women, and some of both sexes not so young, and along with the innocent seekers for a little fun and entertaining exercise, thronged the reckless, the designing and the artful, the corrupt and the corrupting. What presently followed? The raid upon the place, the wholesale capture of disorderly characters of both sexes, arraignment and trial, and the closing of the debasing resort, forms a part of the police history of the city. There was quiet again over the ground where not a few faithful ones of generations past had been laid to rest.

A few steps west of the site of the Carousel (the latter, since its suppression, having been succeeded by a large, brick business structure) brings us to the corner of Vine and Eighth streets. Standing where these two ways meet, we see on one of the four corners a very prosperous-appearing high-license liquor-saloon. Row upon row of bottled liquors are invitingly displayed in the three or four show-windows, but there is no view of the interior afforded. The two entrance doors at the corner, however, swing open a great many times in the course of the day and night, and a glimpse of a long bar and glittering fixtures may then be obtained. Judging by the number of young men who throng the place, this is undoubtedly a most excellent stand for business. Just below it, on Vine street, there is a variety theater, the displayed posters of which sufficiently show its debasing character. It was, and probably still is, owned by a wealthy brewer. Below the saloon, on Eighth street, there are three amusement places quite similar to the one of which I have just spoken. All these are great feeders of the well-appointed liquor-saloon on the corner.

The keepers of liquor-saloons, as we know, are not concerned to allow the general public to scan too closely the succession of customers who drop the dimes into their tills, while the customers themselves, in many cases, decidedly prefer to be screened from observation. There was a saloon in Germantown, of this closely-shut kind, that I daily passed in going from my home to the railway station. As I approached it, one day, I noticed a large crowd of excited people in the street and on the sidewalk. A young man, it appeared, having been turned out of the place, had directed a brick at the window, which it fractured, breaking also the screen blinds which were back of it, and tumbling, I believe, upon the bar within. The police were promptly on this desperado's track. The poor mother of the lad, however, told me afterward that her son (he was her only son) had been a frequenter of the place; but, having parted with all his money, the liquor-dispenser had refused to trust him, and hence the incident just referred to. Such occurrences were common enough in the days of unlimited license, but the solicitude of selfish prudence, and not mercy, has made them of late years infrequent. The dimes and the dollars go the same way as before, seeing that the liquor bill of this good State attains greater proportions each succeeding year.

On a second of the corners where the two streets of which I was speaking intersect, there is a block of stores, the floor above them, as we may see by a large, lettered sign, being the "Salvation Army Headquarters." The citadels of wickedness are numerous here around, and it is very apparent that a multitude is constantly pressing into them, while but few are found to enter within the walls of salvation. Having sought the attendant of the "barracks" one day last year, I asked him for information respecting the third of the street corners, upon which we looked as we stood by an upper window. It had formerly been a drinking-place, he said, and was owned by the proprietor of the prosperous saloon just opposite. The advent of high-license in Philadelphia shut up this other tavern; yet it was evident that the concentration of business in the one place met all the demands of the thirsty public, and handsomely supplied the exchequer of lessee and owner. The suppressed tavern was now used as a mission station. Expressing to the barracks attendant my regret that the walls of the mission station should be over-covered with the vulgar posters of the neighboring variety theaters, he told me that the occupants of the place had some time ago undertaken to remove the offensive pictures, but they were brusquely informed that if they did not put the bills up again their tenure of the building would terminate very quickly. Verily, the liquor business is solicitous to conceal how it pauperizes the bread-winners, and starves the neglected little ones, and strikes down the only son and support of the widow, yet it dreads not to reveal the abounding evidences of its impurity and licentiousness, hanging them on the walls within, and flaunting them on the walls without, and in the windows thereof, according to what is declared by Jeremiah, the prophet (9: 21): "For death is come up into our windows, and is entered into our palaces, to cut off the children from without, and the young men from the streets."

A few steps west from the intersection of the two streets is a sidewalk newsstand, and a little farther away in the opposite direction is a second of the same—both of them loaded down with sensational, brutalizing and immoral reading matter. A sample publication (printed in Chicago) from one of the stands was submitted by me to the police authorities last year, and the case was given by them into the hands of a special officer. He discovered the Philadelphia agent for the sale of the publication, the said agent giving him a list of the names of booksellers to whom he had supplied it. The newsvender, who was not prosecuted, expressed his thanks to the authorities that he had been leniently dealt with, and would do better; nevertheless the vile book and all the other prints of like sort were seen to be exposed for sale, all the same, when I passed there a little while afterward. Now I feel very sure that not one of the booksellers who had been thus willing to take orders for the book I have specially alluded to, but would have gladly given his cheque for a considerable sum, rather than have been obliged to publicly read in open court some sample pages of the noisome production.

Representations were made to the agent, to the owner and to the lessee of the property on which the other stand is located, as to the damaging character of the stock of reading-matter there, but without avail. I would be sorry to have it supposed that all property owners and lessees are thus callous in regard to their accountability and duty in the premises. One of this other sort, the occupant of a large, centrally-located building replied by return mail to my representation and recommendation: "I would state that I acted very promptly in the matter, and requested an immediate removal." The publishers of two daily papers were written to during the past winter, and had offensive papers that were exposed on their premises similarly banished. Indeed, every self-respecting citizen ought to be able to echo the personal sentiment expressed in a letter which came to me from one of the judges of our Orphans' Court, that "there ought to be but one opinion on this subject."

It will be by this time apparent that the locality where the two ways meet, of which I have been chiefly speaking, is of a kind that would not attract the religiously-concerned parent to pitch his tent there. Near at hand is the building put up by a brewer, about seven years ago, to which was given the name of the Hotel Victoria. The architects announced plans providing for a music and dance-room, with bars for the sale of liquors, on the first floor, and fifty lodging-rooms above. Remonstrance was made to the clerk of the Orphans' Court against granting a license to such a place. The complaint was unheeded; but within a year of its opening, the place had become so vicious a resort that there was a wholesale arrest of the frequenters, the lessees were tried and put in prison, and for a long while thereafter the place stood unoccupied. Close by this "hotel" of ill-repute were numerous dives and sparring-dens on Race street and on Ridge Avenue. I regret to say that the advertisements of quite a number of these were given place in the daily papers. Looking over one of my letter-books (that of 1885), some days ago, I read the draft of a private letter of appeal which had been made to the publisher of an influential daily paper, showing him that in a single advertisement were to be found three palpable violations of the law, towit: A tavern and place of amusement kept by a disreputable character, pugilistic encounters therein, and liquor sold in a place of amusement. The justice and worth of this appeal were fully vindicated, when, under the prohibitory features of the Brooks' law, licenses were a little later refused to every one of these debasing resorts; yet the advertising of them, the invitations to their notorious perils, did not cease until the law had done its work. What a healthy moral effect it would have in any civic community if its newspapers would refuse the advertisements of at least those operatic and theatrical entertainments which by common report are admitted to be vicious, even in the sight of the defenders of stage entertainments!

I believe it was on the day of last month upon which I was requested to prepare a paper for this conference, that I read in my daily paper that the inmates of upwards of thirty disreputable houses, within a few minutes' walk of the intersection of which I am speaking, were arrested for carrying on the nefarious calling of corrupting boys, under the disguise of keeping cigar-shops. Truly an easy and fitting kind of decoy: for what has been the whole business of advertising and furnishing cigarettes to the boys during the past dozen years but a vile traffic of the most corrupting sort? So repulsive have been, and still continue to be, the pictorial accessories of the business, that it would seem as though it must require an effort on the part of any decent purchaser of the weed to go within the circle of such defilement.

When, several years ago, I made an endeavor to bring the base business under the law of the State, which plainly condemns it, and went into the room of the grand jury to lay the matter before them, the atmosphere of the place was so charged with tobacco smoke that the jurymen, unable to discern their manifest duty, could only ignore the bill of indictment and lay the charges upon myself. Happily the judge upon the bench sent back to them the bill, with the remark that he was "not willing to see a citizen punished for doing his duty," while the district attorney, going himself before the grand jury, had the costs taken off the complainant, but had no success in having the previous finding, that defended indecency, reversed. No breach of propriety, I believe, in thus revealing this business of the court. And now we see the pitiful spectacle of the keepers and the inmates of thirty tobacco decoy-shops haled before the magistrate, and all the concealed vice of their degradation made public. Appalling has been the sowing of the evil seeds of impurity on the part of the manufacturers of, and dealers in, cigarettes, so that it seems indeed like a consistent consequent of the trade to find it thus used in direct association with the practice of the most gross immorality. And though these same dealers may say to themselves that the evil of their doings has been concealed, it, too, will surely be brought to the light, and to the true judgment that no man can either pervert or turn aside.

When the King of the Sandwich Islands was in the United States, in 1874, the following telegram was received in this city from New York concerning his movements: "In the evening he was taken to see the 'Black Crook.' To-day he is to attend the services at St. Thomas' church." So, with much assumption of virtue, it is said by a good many of our people that the Hawaiian Queen is naught but a dissolute woman, and on that ground, if no other, she ought to be deposed. Well, what have we to say right here to-day of the good morals and the Christianity observed in this City of Brotherly Love, when that notorious spectacle, the 'Black Crook' is given at the Academy of Music (only a few minutes' walk from here on Broad street), thousands of the vile posters that advertise it being displayed about the city and in all the surrounding towns and villages within reach by its railroads! Our people seem to have no strength to say anything against this polluting spectacle. "Thou makest us a byword among the heathen," said the Psalmist, "a scorn and a derision to them that are round about us," said the Psalmist, "a scorn and a derision did a late heathen paper of Madras, in India, say: "The governors and viceroys, with their drunken balls and bouts, and free social institutions, may frown upon the nautch-girls and do without them so long as they have their ballet girls, opera dancers, and stage actors."

As I look upon the great bronze statue of the beneficent founder of our commonwealth, standing in the open, unpaved area of the City Hall where the two wide central ways of this great city intersect, it has seemed to me that rather than raise it to its intended pinnacle upon the lofty watch-tower, still uncompleted, we had better by far bury it deep in the ground where it stands; unrevealed until that better and purer day shall appear when we shall have ceased licensing the traffic in liquor, in printed poison and in cigarettes, and when we shall have the moral strength to say of such a debauching spectacle as the "Black Crook," that it is a scandal, a hissing and a reproach.

MAH-HAH-BONE.

"Is there no help for the widow's son?" The tragedy of Hiram Abiff enacted upon the public stage would lose prestige with men and be lost to the world.

The "hidden mysteries of the "ancient order" serve as the guardian preserver of this relic of Oriental mythology, and the ever-present desire to know the strange and unrevealed, ever furnishes a new supply of victimized votaries. The "we-know-something-he-don't" spirit of conceit seems a sufficient barrier to study and reliance upon the revealed; so that the devotees of oath-bound secret orders will even stultify themselves in denying that the most secret things of such orders are now revealed to the world. Social order under a democratic government can never be regulated by secret obligations, rites and ceremonies without detriment to society and the government; and the prevalence of such orders during the most questionable period of our government's advancement is not without significance. However great demands there be for the multifarious brotherhoods (and these demands cannot be questioned as secondary effects from deeper causes), their very existence emphasizes the greater demand for the restoration of the one patriotic order of American or national brotherhood. This as to country. And the same is true as to preservation of true religious and social brotherhood.

Secretism as applied to religion can but prove too narrow and clannish to allow the exercise of the liberty so essentially requisite to the broader development of the soul most akin to the divine. The bigotry of open sectarianism is not without its contempt and destructive influence—a source of regret to all true worshipers; but, adding to the fraudulent deception of conniving secrecy, lodgeism becomes so many embryos of disintegrating forces stealing away the vitality of social life. "Bossism" and "rings" are the most undemocratic, non-republican breeders of anarchy possible in partisan politics in a free government; secretism in the social and religious world is greater only as the subject is more causal, fundamental and sacred. It is the hidden death sting concealed beneath the beauty and subtlety of a transformed angel of light. Naught of secrecy beyond the threshold of the family home can ever prove other than destructive to the purest and best social and religious life. One Lord, one faith, one baptism, one wife, one home, one lodge.—J. R. Hodges, in the Wesleyan Methodist.

THE "ADVANCE" AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

"T" writes to the Advance: "Many thanks for the editorial in the Advance of the 15th inst, on 'Secret Societies.' In our little place of 500 inhabitants we have thirteen secret societies. An ex-presiding elder in an installation address lifted the lodge far above the church. The writer and a friend are informed that unless we keep our mouths shut we will have them shut for us. The West is fast becoming overridden, and law, justice and freedom are fast passing into a memory."

The Advance says: "Although Christ, entering upon his public ministry, went forth as one not having a home—not even a 'place whereon to lay his head,' yet his whole previous life had been spent in a home; and in that last hour on the cross he, so to speak, 'insured' the life of his mother, committing her to the home of the beloved disciple. Our Lord's words, which sometimes if taken too literally seem impossible, always assume common sense on the part of the hearer. The 'unthinkableness' of Christ's joining in the oath-bound secret conclave with a lot of flummadiddle ceremonies, and going about his work in the furtive dark-lantern methods, is the utter moral incongruousness of all that with the spirit of Him whose sympathies knew no artificial boundaries, and who never wearied of bidding men 'walk in the light.'"

UNION OF PRAYER FOR THE LORD'S DAY.

The first week of April has been for several years observed in many parts of the world as a season of united prayer for the Lord's day.

In behalf of a large number of Christian people interested therein, the undersigned beg leave to commend this subject to the attention of ministers and churches, and respectfully to suggest that, on the first day of April next, the observance of the Lord's day be made the topic of special instruction and prayer, and, as far as practicable, the remaining days of the week.

The remarkable awakening of public sentiment, during the past year, in defense of the national recognition of the Day of Rest, gives special occasion for gratitude to God, and encouragement to continued efforts for the maintenance of his holy day.

Yet, never was there greater need of prayer for the Divine help in view of the growing tendency on the part of many who profess and call themselves Christians, to spend the hours of the Lord's day in secular pleasures and pursuits.

And never was there more pressing need of prayer that the selfish competitions of trade and greed of gain may not be permitted to rob those who earn their daily bread by their daily labor of their sacred right to rest and worship. Address, Rev. J. H. Knowles, D. D., 203 Broadway, New York, in reference to Sabbath literature suitable for distribution at these services.

REV. GEORGE C. NEEDHAM ON THE LODGE.

Mr. Needham was formerly pastor of the Chicago Avenue (Moody's) church in this city, and when he learned that Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard was to deliver his recent course of lectures against secret societies from its platform, he was moved to write to a prominent member of the church as follows:

"As to secret and oath-bound societies, I know nothing of their inner working by personal experience. By my reading, observation, and hearsay, I do not understand how any Christian man can be connected with them.

"If they are purely business affairs for unregenerate men, there is no legislation that I know of, for them, on the part of the church. If Christian business men affiliate with them, they go contrary to our Lord's teaching, and become unequally yoked with unbelievers. But, if they claim to be a religion, then our place should be that of protest. A society which claims to be of divine origin should be open as day, clear as light, free from incantations and initiations as the primitive church. The Gospel exalts Jesus Christ: it is God's purpose that his Name should be honored, exalted, and proclaimed. The mere recognition of the Bible, and the mere acknowledgment of God, is not enough; and especially when a ritual is connected with heathen ceremonies and paganistic initiations, does the profession of belief in God become presumptuous and blasphemous.

"I am glad there are fearless and honorable men like Pres. Blanchard, who have investigated the modus operandi of these synagogues of Satan, and who expose their shams with righteous denunciation. From all false religions, spiritual humbuggery, ecclesiastical juggling, and secret Babylonian sleight-of-hand-ism, good Lord deliver us."

"MRS. LEASE'S MASONRY."

In addition to what is said on this subject in the letter of our correspondent, "Sunflower," in another part of this issue, perhaps it is proper to give more particulars relating to Mrs. Lease's Masonry, as told by herself, together with the comments of "Sir" Gil. A. Barnard, of this city, Secretary of the Grand Lodge of Illinois. Her statements were made to interviewers during her recent visit here:

She had been asked if it was true, as had been stated, that she was a Mason, and she replied: "When I was a girl of 16 I was living in Lockport, N. Y. A friend of mine, who was a prominent Mason, put it in my way to witness a Masonic initiation, and I saw the three degrees administered to a candidate."

"Were you admitted to the lodge room?"

"No; I was behind a door that had a sliding wicket in it, and I saw the whole proceeding through that wicket. That is the way I became a Mason. For to be in possession of the secrets of the craft is to be a Mason."

"How did you come to make the announcement after so many years of silence?"

"Under rather peculiar circumstances. It was while the decision of my suit with Gov. Lewelling was pending before the Supreme Court. A gentleman said to me: 'You will lose your case; the Governor is a Mason.' 'So am I,' I retorted, and knowing him to be a Mason, I gave him the grip. He looked astonished and remarked that I certainly knew something about Masonry. I then told him I was going to organize a woman's branch of the order, and so the story got out."

It is reported, in this connection, that Secretary Barnard was asked: "How do you account for Mrs. Lease's possession of the Masonic grip and also for her claim to know the ritual and secret works of the order?" He answered: "That is the simplest thing in the world. You or anybody else can acquire the same knowledge if you will spend a dollar or two on books that are exposes of the order. There are several publications, and they are quite accurate. Morgan's exposure was published fifty years ago and was almost perfect; so much so that after it appeared the Grand Lodge of the State of New York changed its ritual." This is a very frank concession to the anti-secrecy reform, if Secretary Barnard is correctly reported. The Cynosure has always made the claim, so candidly acknowledged, that its expositions of Masonry were genuine, and his indorsement puts the seal of the lodge upon their truthfulness.

As for Mrs. Lease, she is a Mason, and a "bright" one, in theory, and, judging from her expressions on the subject, we are inclined to believe that she has been duly and truly prepared for one in her heart. We advise her to read Finney on Masonry.

THE ANARCHISTS.

The London police, assisted by French detectives, are exercising at the railway stations a sharp surveillance over all persons coming from the Continent or going abroad. The London police believe it is best to allow the Anarchists all their wonted freedom, as it is easier to watch their doings in this case than it would be if they were expelled from England and compelled to hide in Continental cities. The French police have again been actively engaged in hunting up Anarchists. Several Anarchists of note have been arrested, among whom was Gaspard Espeonto, a man wanted by the Spanish authorities on account of his connection with the Barcelona outrages.

But all of this proved ineffectual in preventing further outrages. On February 20 a bomb was found in a small hotel in the Rue St. Jacques, in Paris. It exploded ere the police could remove it, injuring five people. Another bomb was discovered at a hotel in the Fauberg St. Martin. It was exploded by order of the authorities, and the explosion did considerable damage to the building.

In the Austrian Reichsrath extraordinary precautions have been taken to prevent the escape of Anarchists in case of an attempt upon the lives of the deputies. An apparatus has been introduced which will enable the president to close all the doors of the House in the event of an outrage.

At Berlin every one regards the Paris explosions as of little interest to Germany. The Socialists, who are in Germany a powerful party, refuse to give even moral support to the Anarchists, and the police organization is deemed sufficiently thorough to bring all offenders to justice, especially as all ranks of society condemn the Anarchistic propaganda.

Bourdin, the man who was killed by his own bomb in London, was buried on February 23. An Anarchist demonstration had been planned for the occasion, but an anti-Anarchistic one took place, the crowd attempting to pull the coffin from the hearse. Quinn, the Anarchist leader, attempted to make a speech at the grave, but as soon as he began: "We have come to bury a martyr——" the police hustled him away. He was, however, released outside the churchyard.—Literary Digest.

AN OPINION.

We do not belong to the A. P. A., nor do we as Christians believe in its methods, but we do not see with what consistency Roman Catholics and their friends can denounce the association as a "criminal conspiracy." Its object is to maintain the government, but to oppose the Catholics. The object of the Roman Catholic church in every land is to place all governments under the control of the Vatican. Of course, it is thought by them that this is the best way to maintain and establish all government—to put it under the control of the Catholic church. The A. P. A. believes that this is the worst thing that could happen to a government, and therefore opposes that church. Has not the A. P. A. as good a right to oppose the Roman Catholic church as the Roman Catholic church has to oppose the A. P. A.? As to the truthfulness of the claims of Rome regarding her beneficent offices in the establishment of nations and governments, let history speak. It would be well to listen to its voice.—Signs of the Times, Oakland, Cal.

RELICS OF ANCIENT ASSYRIA.

It is a noteworthy coincidence that some of the leading illustrated magazines for January should contain cognate articles of great interest to students of archæology and history, and of special value to Bible students. The coincidence is also indicative of the great popular interest in the Bible and Biblical themes, for these magazines are neither technical, scientific nor religious, but essentially popular, and they successfully cater to the popular taste of the reading and thinking classes.

But to our readers most interesting and important is The Century paper of Prof. Mossis Jastrow, Jr., of the University of Pennsylvania, on "The Bible and Assyrian Monuments," in which are carefully examined in detail certain of the discoveries of Geo. Smith, Rassam, De Sarzac, Ward and Peters in the Mesopotamian mounds. These refer particularly to the remarkable clay tables forming the library of Ashurbanabel, king of Assyria in the seventh century B. C., the monuments of Shalmaneser II., the sculptures, tablets and inscriptions of Sennacherib's palace at Ninevah, and those also of Nebuchadnezzar. The first, though fragmentary, includes the Babylonian traditions of the creation and of the deluge; the others, accounts of military campaigns, including those against Jehu, king of Israel, and Hezekiah, king of Judea.

The wonderful results of the marvelous decipherment of cuneiform and hieroglyphic writing are of great and cumulative interest, but our space forbids entering this attractive field. We must content ourselves with this brief extract from Sit-napishti's account of the deluge, as illustrative both of the close correspondence and to some extent of the radical difference between the Babylonian and Hebrew traditions, evidently drawn from a common source: "During six days and seven nights, wind, flood and storm raged violently, but with the break of the seventh day the storm abated, the flood, which had waged a war like an invading army, ceased, the waters decreased, and the wind and storm ceased. I sailed over the waters, raising my voice in loud lament that the habitations of men had been turned into mud. Then I opened a window, and as the light of day fell upon my countenance I covered it, and sat down and wept. The tears rolled down my cheeks. I sailed about in all directions, until after twelve days a piece of land came into sight. It was the mountain of Nisir which the ship had reached. There the ship held fast, and did not release its hold.

At the break of the seventh day (after striking Nisir) I took out a dove and let her fly. The dove flew to and fro, but, finding no resting place, she returned. Then I sent out a swallow, but she also flew to and fro until, finding no resting place, she returned. Then I released a raven. The raven flew about, and saw that the waters had decreased, and came very near to the ship again, croaked, but did not return. Then I let out everything to the four winds, and offered up a sacrifice, making an atonement on the summit of the mountain."—Chicago Plowshare.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A lamb-like March.—The Providence Tea Party.—Prohibition matters.—The Boys' Brigade.—Hard times and popular amusements.—An æsthetic alderman.

Bryant's familiar lines on March have been falsified so far, for it has had no "wild" or "stormy" days, but, on the contrary, has worn the lambskin right along; nor has old Boreas blown it aside even once to show us the lion within. I do not know why one's enjoyment of blue skies and springing grass and tender melody of returning birds must be always qualified by the predictions of the croakers whom warm weather, in advance of the calendar, seems to affect much as it does the frogs. But why need we listen to their ominous prophecies? Rather let us drink in, to the full, the beauty of these rare days—doubly and trebly rare in March—and pity those misguided mortals who flee to Florida, with its monotonous pine-barrens and alligator-infested shores, to escape a few rough blasts, foregoing, at the same time, the delicious trill of the first spring bird, the gleam of the first wild flower.

Among historic events which happened in this month—if we may call that historic which histories seldom or never mention—is "the Providence Tea Party" on the night of March 2, 1775. The Boston affair preceded it by two months—hence its greater name and fame. Three hundred pounds of the obnoxious British tea was then burned at the docks, and the act has been recently commemorated in Providence by the dedication of a bronze tablet of large size which has been erected near the spot.

But, talking about taxed tea, what a mere bagatelle was this measure, which our fathers thought so oppressive, compared to the taxes imposed on their long-suffering descendants by the liquor power! The papers tell us that Massachusetts tax-payers pay $5,000 to purchase tobacco for the inmates of the State's prison, and $1,200 for the House of Correction in South Boston. The W. C. T. U. has been looking into the matter, and, through its honored President, Mrs. Gordon, has sent some statistics to the city press which ought to make our legislators on Beacon Hill blush. For instance, the cost of maintaining the State's prison is over one-quarter of a million annually. The institution at Foxborough, for inebriates, has cost the State nearly that. Add other penal institutions and almshouse, the vast majority of whose inmates are there through drink, and the cost of maintaining them is seen to be simply appalling. Women tax-payers can now only protest through the papers against the monstrous injustice of making them pay the taxes resulting from a system against which they are so generally opposed. May they soon be given the chance to record their protest at the polls. Two towns in Massachusetts (Georgetown and Monterey) cast a tie vote on the question of license this spring. A tie vote, according to the construction put upon it by the Prohibitionists, is a negative vote. This is in accordance with Cushing's Manual; but the license men, setting parliamentary authorities at naught, insist on a recount. Revere had also an exciting town-meeting, lasting all day and all night, the burning question at issue being liquor or no liquor. The vote of 90 majority against license was announced at 4 o'clock in the morning to the crowd in the town hall, which had waited till then to know the result. Had the question on the ballots been put the other way:—"Shall the issue of licenses be prohibited?" the license party, in a tie vote, would have had the advantage.

The old town of Dedham held its 258th town meeting this spring, and very wisely and appropriately elected Mrs. Anna E. Ely, wife of Judge Ely, on its Board of Overseers of the Poor. The best citizens, including some who are bitterly opposed to woman-suffrage, were a unit in her favor. In conservative Old England women have long held this office, and the ends of justice, philanthropy and economy have been found to be much better served. Many are the almshouses, in our back districts especially, that need and should have womanly supervision.

Fast Day is gone, never to return, and in its place we are to have the 19th of April. It would have been well had the Solons on Beacon Hill seen fit to abolish along with it some of the many reasons that so imperatively call for fasting on the part of every patriotic Christian citizen. The House had a disgraceful wrangle on the question whether to sustain the Senate's amendment that the law requiring saloons to close on Fast Day should also apply to this new holiday. One member—Hayes, of Lowell—desired to have the bill tabled, while the representative from Chelsea thought it "unfair to pass an amendment which would deprive a large number of people from celebrating the day in the spirit in which it was intended;" in other words, to abridge their liberty to get gloriously drunk if they wanted to! I am glad to say that the speaker ruled to sustain the amendment, as a point both of order and courtesy to the Senate. If the 19th of April "goes dry," this will be an entering wedge for shutting up the saloon on the other national holidays.

The Democratic party, who govern the Hub, are clamorous for representation on the schoolboard, and stirred up quite a lively scene in the House, the other day. "Minority representation" means Romish representation—a thing against which Mrs. E. Trask Hill and other noble women have fought so valiantly.

A recent hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs, relative to a change in the laws which forbids any but the regular militia to bear arms, is important in this connection, for the principal petitioners are the officers and members of the First Regiment of Hibernian Rifles, and the officers of the Catholic Total Abstinence Society. Why it should be a help to a temperance body to have connection with it a semi-military company, as one of them stated, it is difficult to fathom. These quasi-military organizations, independent of, and sometimes bitterly opposed to, each other on religious and political grounds, are fraught with seeds of fearful danger for the future. I am glad to see that in Malden the schools have discontinued the military and calisthenic drill, the board giving the very sensible reason that the scholars would get much more benefit by devoting the time heretofore given to military exercises to their regular studies. The "Boys' Brigade," I see from the Willimantic Journal, had a prize drill a few nights ago, and "showed a good-sized audience what they knew about military tactics." Like an old-fashioned spelling match, each young soldier, when found deficient, had to drop out of the line, the ones who kept their places when their comrades had gone on the retired list winning the first and second prizes respectively. These consisted of silver medals "in the form of crossed guns with the cross suspended and suitably inscribed." The old crusaders saw no incongruity between the cross on their banners, and sword and battle axe in their hands; but Christians of to-day ought to realize that the fire-arms of the soldier, and the cross of the Prince of Peace, have nothing in common with each other.

It is said that Boston's charitable institutions are feeling keenly the hard times. One of the most worthy, the Perkins Institute for the Blind, has had to refuse several needy applicants, for lack of funds. And at the same time every place of amusement is doing a rushing business. The managers of the grand opera at Mechanics' Hall took in $21,000 in a single day, and in two weeks over $132,000. One reads such figures and wonders if hard times are not a myth.

One of the funny things that occasionally happen is the proposition of one of the Hub's Irish aldermen to remove Leif Ericsson's statue from the Back Bay to East Boston, because it offends his artistic taste, and as he has to pass it on the way between his home and the City Hall, is a serious annoyance. This is cooler than her east winds. But East Boston thinks, and says very decidedly through her representatives, that "a statue which is not good enough for the Back Bay is not good enough for us. "So poor Leif Ericsson will continue to occupy his old post, and Alderman Lee, if he does not like it, must look another way. It is the work of Anne Whitney, who modelled the beautiful statue of Harriet Martineau at Wellesley College, and the real animus of the objection made to it does not hinge on its art, good or bad. It is not likely that Boston's æsthetic alderman would make any wry faces at the worst executed statue of Columbus, but one to the great Swede contradicts Rome's claim that America owes its first discovery to her, and is hated accordingly.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

Washington, March 14, 1894.

Judge Bradley, who is presiding over the trial of the suit for breach of promise of marriage of Miss Madeline Pollard against Representative Breckenridge, of Kentucky, now in progress here, has set an example worthy of being followed by every judge who has to preside over similar trials, by excluding women from the court-room, excepting those connected with the case. If some way could be discovered to get the editors of the daily newspapers to exclude the details of the testimony in similar cases, a much-desired reform would be accomplished. No one will pretend to claim that any good can possibly be accomplished by the publication of such "news," and that it does much harm to young people is painfully apparent to all observing parents. Washington papers are no worse, in this respect, than other papers in large cities, but it is none the less exasperating on that account to find your afternoon and morning papers filled with column after column of testimony which an upright judge has decided to be unfit for ladies to hear, and which you would be mortified to discover your children reading. It is surprising that the average editor of a daily newspaper who is an educated and refined gentleman, often the father of young girls, should consider that when he has published a little church and temperance news he has done his whole duty towards Christianity and moral reform and is justified, by the money it will bring in, in printing all of the sensational—too often verging on the indecent—matter he can possibly get. It is no argument to say, as some of them have said, that the sole object in publishing a newspaper is to make money. The same can be truthfully said of running rum-shops, dives, gambling houses, and of committing theft, but none of these occupations are considered on that account either excusable or honorable. All of these things have been said before, and said better, but it is only by continually saying them that public sentiment can be raised to the pitch of demanding a reform.

Bishop Hurst gave some interesting facts concerning the great American University, to be located here, in his closing address to the Washington Conference. He mentioned that a New York lady had lately contributed $100,000 and afterwards added a donation of $750; and that $61,720 had been contributed by preachers alone of the $100,000 it is proposed to spend on Asbury Hall, one of the University buildings. The conference on the spot added $1,146 to this fund and took steps that will result in increasing it. The Bishop said that the corner-stone of the University would be laid this year, and that he had the promise of a Presbyterian to subscribe $25,000 as soon as that ceremony was performed. While the University will be under the control of the Methodist church, it is not proposed to make it distinctly a denominational institution. Several other denominations will be represented upon the board which is to have direct control of the University.

The committee which had charge of the Moody and Sankey meetings has made public the results of its work. The cost of the four weeks' meetings was, in round figures, $4,000. Messrs. Moody and Sankey charged nothing for their services, but it is expected that a purse will be raised and presented to them, or to Mr. Moody's training school at Northfield, should they decline to accept it. According to the cards in the hands of the secretary of the committee there were 4,000 converts, and considerably more than half of them were men. Upon each one of these cards is the name of the denomination which the writer prefers, where there was a preference. These cards will be turned over to the ministers of the churches nearest the residences of the signers, and it is expected that the most of the signers will soon be formally enrolled as members of our churches. Another result of these meetings, by no means to be overlooked, is the largely increased attendance at our churches, larger now than ever before. Many of the converts were hard drinkers, one of them having been a drummer for a large whisky house, who, after hearing one of Mr. Moody's temperance sermons, forwarded his resignation and determined never to have anything to do with the accursed stuff again, either as a seller or as a drinker.

A very important statement concerning the reciprocity clause of the new tariff bill was this week made by Senators Voorhees and Vest. According to these gentlemen the popular impression that the repeal of the reciprocity clause of the McKinley law, as proposed in the new tariff bill, will abrogate the reciprocity agreements now in force is erroneous. They say that the repeal will not interfere with agreements now existing, but will prevent the making of any new agreements, or treaties, of a similar nature. Speaking of treaties, it is not believed that the proposed amendment to the tariff bill, which was inserted by the Finance Committee at the request of the sugar interest, abrogating the co-commercial treaty between the United States and Hawaii, can get a majority in the Senate.

The Senate has devoted this week to a discussion of the Bland bill for the coinage of the seignorage, which will be voted upon to-morrow. Its passage is regarded as assured. The House is devoting its time to the regular appropriation bills. No agreement has yet been reached by the Senate Finance Committee as to when the tariff bill shall be reported to the Senate, but the indications point to one in a few days.

Forty-five of the ninety-nine jails in Iowa are empty as a result of prohibition, and yet some of her citizens wish to repeal the law and bring back the saloon.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PROGRESS OF OUR WORK ON THE PACIFIC COAST.

PHILOMATH, Ore., March 5, 1894.

I am able to report progress. His satanic majesty is being stirred up here to no little extent.

According to previous announcement, I drove out, yesterday afternoon, and preached a discourse at Oak Ridge Presbyterian church, on the subject of secret societies. The congregation was unusually large. As customary, there were a number of lodgemen out. One Odd-fellow lost his jewel; and if we could have stayed for an after-meeting, we could have either got him out of the lodge, or got the whole lodge business out of him. He was an irritable fellow, who does not know when to quit talking, and consequently would have given the whole thing away.

The meeting, I think, accomplished good. It caused the deacons referred to in a former communication to take a decided stand in our favor. Some after-talk by lodgemen was intended to cast sand in the eyes of the uninitiated, by saying: "The first principles of the Odd-fellows require a belief in the Almighty God." We answered them by asking: "Why do they not require a belief in Jesus Christ? He is the only Saviour, and the orders does not recognize him." We made the point prominent, that they cause men to hope for salvation without the merits of the atonement of Jesus. This they dare not deny.

We distributed a number of tracts, and advertised the Cynosure and our work, and left them to their own reflections. P. B. WILLIAMS.

SEATTLE, Wash., March 3, 1894.

DEAR BRO. WILLIAMS:—I am glad to hear that you are still on the battlefield for right. May God wonderfully bless and sustain you, and make you as a sharp threshing instrument having teeth. You will need much divine help if you go to California. It is a very hard field of labor.

I lectured on Wednesday night at Roslyn, in Unity Hall, which is the largest building in the town. The hall was filled. They threatened to rotten-egg me and hang me before the lecture; but we had no disturbance, and a grand victory for the right. They allowed me to walk safely and peacefully out of town. I am still alive. Praise the Lord!

I lectured in Tyler last night. The weather being very unfavorable, the crowd was not so large. However, we had a fair audience and a very profitable time.

I am to lecture at Chavelah and Pine City this round. So you see I am hammering away.

J. C. SCOTT.

THE HEARING AT WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., March 6, 1894.

EDITOR CYNOSURE:—A hearing was given before the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives at Washington, D. C., on Tuesday, March 6, on behalf of the Christian amendment to the United States Constitution. Delegates were there from ten different States, and as many more would have been represented had there been time for preparation. As it was, the committee-room was filled to its utmost capacity. Letters were read from distinguished advocates of the amendment who were providentially kept from attending.

Rev. Joseph Cook, the Boston Monday-lecturer, wrote: "I favor the movement on four grounds specially. 1. The Declaration of Independence acknowledges the authority of God over nations. Charles Sumner maintained that the Declaration was the nation's promise and the Constitution its fulfillment. Slavery was sectional and freedom universal. This claim was vindicated, and the 14th and 15th amendments adopted to legalize the freedom and citizenship of our colored population. So the Declaration acknowledges God's rights in the governments of earth. Let us legalize that by adopting this amendment. 2. In more than forty State constitutions God's authority is recognized. Our national Constitution should be up to this level. 3. On our national coin we read: 'In God we trust.' 4. The Supreme Court of the United States, in February, 1892, declared that 'this is a Christian nation.'"

Dr. A. A. Minor, of Boston, wrote that although he could not be present in body, his heart was with us, and his heart's desire and prayer to God was that the proposed amendment would be carried through triumphantly.

Dr. Clark, of Boston, President of the Y. P. S. C. E., wrote that the movement had his fullest sympathies, and he regretted that other duties made it impossible for him to attend the hearing at Washington.

The President of the National Reform Association, Hon. Felix R. Brunot, of Pittsburgh, sent hearty greetings to the promoters of this amendment, and expressed the hope that it would prevail.

Ex-Justice Strong, the first President of the National Reform Association, a ripe Christian of over ninety years, sent his prayers and well-wishes for the cause.

The Presbyterian and Methodist Ministers' Associations of Cincinnati communicated their unanimous endorsement of the proposed amendment.

Petitions were received from localities reaching from Massachusetts Bay to the Golden Gate. A petition from Ohio, twenty-five feet long, was reported.

Hon. W. A. Stone, Representative from Pennsylvania, said: "Only four persons expressed opposition, and two of them were in the lunatic asylum."

Rev. H. H. George, D. D., Field Secretary of the National Reform Association, at the request of Hon. D. B. Culberson, chairman of the Judiciary Committee, introduced the speakers. He first read the form of amendment before Congress and said: "Man is individually and personally responsible to God. He is born into the family, and the marriage relation is an ordinance of God, and the family is responsible to God. Man is born into the nation. The nation is not a voluntary association that you may join or be separated from. It is of God. It is born, not made. We are born into the nation and are in our normal state in the nation, as certainly as in the family. The members of the body do not enjoy life separated from the body, but in union with it. So the people enjoy social, political, civil and national life in the national body. This amendment expresses the nation's relations and obligations to God."

The first speaker was Rev. T. P. Stevenson, D. D., of Philadelphia. He quoted Lamartine, to show that an atheistic republic could not endure. Religion is the only preservative element of a free government.

Prof. R. J. George, D. D., of the Reformed Presbyterian Seminary, Allegheny, followed. His subject was: "The kingship of the Lord Jesus Christ over the nations." He advanced three lines of proof: 1. God has appointed Christ as king. In Psalm 24 the question is asked: "Who is this king of glory?" I go to the Jordan for the answer. After the baptism of Jesus the voice from the excellent glory declared: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well-pleased." God gave to him a name that is above every name. All power in heaven and earth hath been given unto him. Creation, providence, and redemption are Christ's centric. The nations are under his authority. When God created man he gave him dominion. We read that the whole world lieth in the wicked one—Satan. But Christ came to destroy the works of the devil, and rob him of his power. It is the purpose of God that this world shall be ruled not by a fallen angel, but by a perfect man, the man Christ Jesus. 2. God commands the nations to honor and obey Christ. The second Psalm is an illustration: "Be wise now, therefore, O, ye kings, be instructed, ye judges of the earth; serve the Lord in fear; kiss the Son." 3. It is fitting that the nations should honor Christ. He that hath not the Son hath not the Father. All judgment (government) hath been given to the Son. When Gen. Washington had led the American armies to victory in the Revolution, it was fitting that he should be twice called to be the President of the new republic. When Gen. Grant had conquered a peace, and showed himself as magnanimous in triumph as in battle, he was properly called to twice fill the Presidential chair. So the Lord Jesus Christ has conquered our enemy, even Satan, and taken his dominion from him, and freed his captives. It is fitting that the nations of the redeemed should bring their glory and honor into His kingdom. "Honor the King."

Rev. W. H. Robinson, D. D., of Allegheny, came next. He argued that the great powers with which the government is invested proves it to be a divine institution. There is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. He beareth not the sword in vain. He distinguished between the vital or historic constitution of the nation and the written. The first is Christian here; the second ought to be.

Rev. J. M. Foster, of Boston, followed, on "The Responsibility of Nations." A nation is a moral being. It has reason, will and conscience. It is capable of rights and obligations. It has a character for good and evil. National faith, national honor, national integrity are phrases in constant use. It has a unity and continuity running through the generations. The Scriptures speak of "ungodly nation," "hypocritical nation," "wicked nation," and "righteous nation," "holy nation," "godly nation." Milton, the English poet and statesman, said: "A nation ought to be one huge Christian personage, one mighty growth and stature of an honest man, as big and compact in virtue as in body." Ours is a Christian nation. The Pilgrim Fathers, before landing on Plymouth Rock, drafted a constitution which reads: "In the name of God. Amen. For the glory of God and the maintenance of the Christian faith." All the colonial charters and compacts contained the principle embodied in the ordinance of 1787: "Religion, morality and knowledge are essential to good government." The constitutions of the thirteen original States recognized God and forty-two out of forty-four today do so.

I. A Christian nation is responsible to God for the use of its great powers. It has the power of life and death. This does not reside in the individual or the mass, yet the state every day exercises it. The only account of this is, power comes from Almighty God. Let us acknowledge the fact in our national Constitution. But the Father hath given all authority and power to the Son. We ought to acknowledge him as our Lawgiver and King.

II. A Christian nation is responsible to God for the administration of the moral law. The state is the keeper of both tables of the Decalogue. Blackstone says: "Any law that contravenes the law of God is no law at all."

Rev. R. C. Wylie next spoke. He maintained that the state is that settled order of things that is manifestly in harmony with the divine will. No question is settled until it is settled right. The law of God is the ultimate standard.

Prof. D. B. Willson, D. D., of Allegheny, then read a paper.

Rev. D. McAllister, D. D., LL. D., of Pittsburgh, editor of the Reformer and Dissenter, spoke last. He recalled the scene in the United States Senate in March, 1863, when that body petitioned President Lincoln to proclaim a day of confession and humiliation for national sins, "encouraged," as they continued, "by the assurances of his Word to seek him for succor according to his appointed way, through Jesus Christ,"—the words used in the submitted form of amendment. President Lincoln promptly responded and appointed April 30 as a day for national humiliation. The expression in the amendment proposed: "Devoutly recognizing the supreme authority and just government of Almighty God in all the affairs of men and nations," is also taken from this resolution of the Senate. The expression: "A Christian nation," is taken from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, on February 28, 1892. The phrase: "Grateful to him for our civil and religious liberty," occurs in about thirty of our State constitutions. So there is a precedent for what is asked in our national history. And now, gentlemen, permit me to say, that there is the highest legal authority for saying that it is the province of our national councils to submit this amendment; and now that it is proposed, there is an imperative duty resting upon you to submit it to the people. The people are the sovereign national power to accept or reject it. You are face to face with a most momentous question. You will soon pass away and others will come to fill your places. But your action here in this matter will live through future generations. Make your action right, and future ages will call you blessed.

Hon. Elijah P. Morse, of Massachusetts, who introduced the amendment in the House, spoke in favor of the measure. Then the committee adjourned.

Very welcome to all who like to look behind the scenes and see how the great London dailies are worked.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master."—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects. By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

LODGE NOTES.

FREEMASONRY.

Masonry has, in the past, been a bone of contention in religious agitations, and has come again and again unscathed from the onslaught of its detractors. It is not Christianity, nor Judaism, nor Mohammedanism, but Masonry; the tie that binding man to man, requires naught to make it perfect.—Square and Compass.

In a recent discourse, Mgr. Fava, Bishop of Grenoble, stated that the lodges of the brotherhood are federated centers of political intrigue. He said: "It was the English Freemasons who pushed France to join in the Crimean war against Russia in order that she might exhaust her gold and treasure in that needless combat; it was the French Freemasons who incited France to fight Austria, a Catholic nation, in order to bring about the unity of Italy....resisting the temporal power of the Pope."

ODD FELLOWSHIP.

It is reported that one encampment in Chicago reports 107 "drops" for non-payment of dues at the close of 1893. A few more such "wipes" and that encampment will fade from sight.

The jurisdiction of Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, New Zealand and Tasmania, forming the subsovereign jurisdiction of Australasia, contained 19,988 members of the Independent Order of Odd-fellows at the close of 1892. The losses through non-payment of dues aggregated 6,527.

Patriarchs Militant.—What, if any, good has resulted from the legislation of the Sovereign Grand Lodge, in reorganizing that branch of the order it is difficult to decide. Really, it does seem as though it has utterly failed in installing any new life into it. There seems to be a screw loose somewhere. The Sovereign Grand Lodge yielded every point contended for by the Patriarchs, yet that spirit of lethargy, which the cantons seem to have fallen into, does not appear to have been shaken off.

March April May.

These are the months when everyone needs a spring medicine, owing to the change in temperature and the changed habits of the body which become necessary with the approach of warmer weather. For the feeling of exhaustion and debility which always accompanies the opening of the season nothing equals Hood's Sarsaparilla. It seems to make one all over new, giving a good appetite and good digestion in place of dyspeptic feelings, strength and vigor for weakness and lassitude and sweet refreshing sleep in place of the restless and sleepless condition caused by the tired nerves and enervated body. Everyone knows that it is on account of its debilitated condition that the body is more liable to attacks of disease in the spring than at any other time and by its influence in building up the system at this season Hood's Sarsaparilla is the means of saving thousands from the grip, pneumonia and typhoid fever. Those who have failed to take it as a preventive of these diseases and have suffered from them, will also find it just what they need to renew their strength which the grip, especially, seems to have totally destroyed.

"I had the grip from which I did not fully recover. I was all run down and suffered with severe headaches. Pains in the back and such a tired feeling made me wish for death to relieve me from my intense sufferings. Like a drowning person grasping at a straw, I bought a bottle of Hood's Sarsaparilla, and before it was gone I noticed a great change. I purchased a second and third bottle and wish I could convince everyone what an excellent medicine Hood's Sarsaparilla has proved to be in my case." MRS. WILFRED JOHNSON, Box 4, Kellogg, Minnesota.

The best way to avoid scalp diseases, hair falling out, and premature baldness is to use the best preventive known for that purpose—Hall's Hair Renewer.

The Christian Cynosure.

HENRY M. HUGUNIN - - - - Editor.

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 22, 1894.

MASONRY IN MILWAUKEE.

On Monday week, at Milwaukee, Wis., as we learn from a press dispatch of that date, "at a district meeting of Congregational clergymen at Plymouth church, the Masonic order came in incidentally for a complimentary reference. The matter was brought up in the discussion following a paper on 'The Congregational Church,' by Rev. I. L. Cory, of Pilgrim church. The Freemasons were mentioned together with other organizations which have the religious welfare of man in mind as well as his temporal interests. Portions of the application blanks for membership with the Freemasons, which require a belief in the deity as one of the requisites in candidates, were cited. It was also shown that Christianity with the Masons increased as the higher degrees were taken. One of the clergymen told a story of a lady parishioner who had come to him with a story of her husband's change from a blasphemer to a devout Christian through his becoming a Mason."

Thus runs the press version.

Instances of Masonic conversion have been related before; but as Masonry and Christianity are as widely diverse in their principles and practices as hell and heaven, it is difficult to believe that such conversions are genuine, or that they ever occurred. Such narratives are concocted for the benefit of Freemasonry, which is willing to stoop to any subterfuge that will accrue to its advantage.

Mackey's "Encyclopædia of Freemasonry," page 641 (edition of 1875), gives the lie direct to all such stories, by saying: "Freemasonry is NOT Christianity, nor a substitute for it." To say, therefore, that Freemasonry is capable of converting a soul to Christianity is absurd, since it has no object in making proselytes to a system foreign to itself.

Chase's "Digest of Masonic Law," page 206, says: "To require that a candidate professes a belief in the divine authenticity of the Bible, or a state of future rewards and punishments, is a serious innovation in the very body of Masonry."

Chase's "Digest," page 207, also further settles this question by saying: "The Jews, the Chinese, the Turks, each reject either the New Testament or the Old, or both; and yet we see no good reason why they should not be made Masons. In fact, Blue Lodge Masonry has nothing whatever to do with the Bible. It is not founded on the Bible; if it was, it would not be Masonry—it would be something else."

Quoting from the Milwaukee dispatch, we are told: "It was also shown that Christianity with the Masons increased as the higher degrees were taken." Morris' "Dictionary" (article "Christian Masonry") says on this point: "The orders Knight Templar and Knights of Malta, together with many of the degrees and orders in Scotch Masonry, are intensely Christian in their doctrines; their ceremonies also embody events in the life of Christ. Some of the side and adoptive degrees have the same reference, i. e., the cross and crown. This fact, of course, forfeits the claim of such degrees and orders to be styled universal Masonry."

Rev. Mr. Cory should read Ste[illegible]n Merritt's renunciation if he really believes that Freemasonry is of God and not of the devil. That ought to convince any honest seeker after the truth of Masonry.

THE OPINIONS OF A PATRIARCH.

The following opinion of the A. P. A. movement, furnished by request, comes from a New England preacher, now nearly ninety years of age. His brother-in-law, then living at Batavia, N. Y., called the first meeting to consider the abduction of William Morgan. As a minister of the Gospel and educator he has been prominent for half a century, and in former days was a personal friend and associate of Wm. H. Seward, Millard Fillmore, Thurlow Weed and other distinguished men. In facts and events relating to their careers he is considered a perfect encyclopedia, and he has been a life-long opponent of secret societies:

DEAR ———:—Your request for a review of your position on the A. P. A. organization has been so long delayed that an extended criticism would seem undesirable. That you may see about how I stand, personally, I will report to you, and, if you so choose, to your readers, a fragment of a debate in our recent town-meeting, during which it was charged that the business was being pushed under the influence of the A. P. A. My reply, in substance, was as follows:

"It is with deep regret that the conviction is forced upon me that the cities and larger towns are under the absolute control of secret organizations, founded on race or religious distinctions; where the interests of the communities are disregarded, and personal or race prejudices and ambitions are the only aims and motives which govern their action; and where the wearing on the person of a scapular is the token that the person so decorated is in sympathy with the purposes of the organization; while the password which gains admission to it is 'Pat. Rex.' ('Patrick is king.') If the time shall ever come when such organizations are to be met, and their ends and aims exposed and defeated, I shall seek out an organization where heaven's own sunshine is freely admitted through its unshuttered windows, and under whose uplifted portals I can pass with head erect and with a manly step, and be met from within by the song and the shout: 'Vive l' America!—Long live America!—America is king!'"

"A DEFENSE OF SECRET SOCIETIES."

In two of the Galesburg (Ill.) newspapers, quite recently, appeared a paper purporting to have been read by Mrs. Lovejoy before some sort of gathering, somewhere in that city, bearing the above title. That any woman of intelligence, and possessing the ordinary characteristics of her sex, should have the hardihood to publicly defend the murder of Morgan by the Masons, and denounce him as the violator of a solemn obligation, when the fact of his murder is the crowning evidence of the wickedness of that "fraternal" obligation, would almost surpass belief, were it not that she wrote prejudicially, as we hope, through ignorance.

The boldness and apparent sincerity of her defense of secret societies, in which she omits the usual discriminations made by such writers, also indicate her ignorance. She does not except the Clan-na-Gael, the Mafia, the Mollie Maguires or the Anarchists, but includes all in her category, so far as human observation can discover. For this she is excusable, also only on the plea of ignorance.

Yet it is this very ignorance that gives the roseate hue to her essay—the very same sort as that which leads those who are NOT lodge-members to uphold secret societies as merely social and protective institutions, in which there is no guile. This error is fostered and promulgated among the uninitiated everywhere by those who belong to the lodges, and who know that they are lying in support of their obligation, which requires them to exercise secrecy, silence, or open falsehood, in the presence of non-secretists.

But let Mrs. Lovejoy speak for herself (1) in approval of the murder of Morgan, and (2) her system of lodge piety, as found in her own beloved lodge:

"When Morgan undertook to expose the secrets of the order by his Anti-masonic publications, and thereby formed a political party, his career was cut short; and when the act was investigated no jury could be found to convict for the destruction of one who could violate so solemn an obligation."

"I am more and more impressed at each initiation with the beauty of our own degree of Honor obligation. Do we all feel the solemnity of those profound words as we should, and in laying them up in our hearts practice them by speaking gently, encouraging the weak?—and when we seek admittance to that upper temple may we carry with us the true password that will gain an entrance into the assembly of the redeemed."

That is a pretty mixture of murder and religion, truly. And her article was published in her home papers by the request and recommendation of Rev. Mr. Blodgett, of the M. E. church, and others in Galesburgh.

Mrs. Lovejoy's effusion attracted the attention of an intelligent anti-secrecy reformer in Galesburgh, by whom friends of the Cynosure have occasionally been edified, and in a subsequent number of one of the city papers he calmly replied to her fallacies concerning the lodge.

Referring to her plea that the "great object" of secret societies is "protection," our correspondent seems to think that it is the lodges themselves that need protection against their most formidable enemy—the religion of Jesus Christ. "Beware," he says, "of Christianity. Its success is your death-warrant . . . . It will yet drive you from your opposition to the poor and the weak who cannot pay you a fixed tribute of money for charity's sake. It will yet force you to recognize all men as brothers"—without the use of grips, due-guards, signs and passwords. "When you have reached this stage you will, of course, have no advantage over your fellowmen in the inherent rights of life and the pursuit of happiness; and, what is better, you will desire none, but will lay aside the burdens of time and money squandered, and, what is worse, the burden of a guilty mind, and love the Lord with all your strength."

Christians in close communion with our Lord and Saviour need none of the "protection" of the lodge. They are looking higher. "My help cometh from the Lord," is their hope. They are neither afraid for the terror by night, nor the arrow that flieth by day, nor the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor the destruction that wasteth at noonday; yea, though a thousand fall beside them, and ten thousand on their right hand; for they have the Lord's promise that these evils shall not come nigh them. Do they need the "protection" of the lodge? Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with them—those fraternities which frame mischief by a law—which gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous and condemn the innocent blood? What fellowship hath Christ with Belial?

The day has gone by when the lodge can defend itself successfully against the truths of Christianity, by which it is shown to be only a cage of unclean birds in the sight of God.

E. T. MC'INTIRE'S CORRESPONDENT.

Another champion, "moved with choler," has spoken in defence of the "mystic brotherhood" of "Jubela and Jubelo, and also Jubelum." It happened on this wise. Bro. E. T. McIntire, saved by grace, abandoned the follies of his past life. He no longer bred fast horses for the race-track, and no longer "dined and wined" the "sports" on the Sabbath, as had been his wont. He forsook his "cups" and cigars, and left off dancing, card-playing and swearing. He no longer frequented the theaters and the lodges, as in his former days. He went upon no more "pilgrimages" with the "Sir Knights," among whom distillers, and preachers, and brewers, and deacons, and rumsellers, and rumdrinkers, and Sabbath-school teachers were "hail-fellows well-met" with each other and with high-toned fast men in society. The whole trend of his existence was changed. With his family he sought the house of God on the Sabbath, and offered the morning and evening sacrifice of prayer and praise in his quiet home. He liberally sustained missions for the poor and homeless, and humbly but fearlessly told how the Lord had made him "free indeed." This new life thereupon stirred up a certain "son of Belial" to revile and berate this faithful witness for the truth in Jesus, and to write to him as follows:

JENKINTOWN, Pa., March 3, 1894. Mr. E. T. McIntire—Sir: I notice a meeting has been held in Philadelphia against secret societies, at which you were present and participated. Now I have not been so curious as you to connect myself with secret orders, which, I have no doubt, was the motive that prompted you, and being disappointed, you now rail against them. Now anyone who knows enough to go in when it rains knows that the only object of secrecy is to prevent being imposed upon by just such arrant hypocrites as you and your followers are.

The purpose of their societies, as I always understood, are (sic) to help each other when their necessities require help, which, if it was not for the secrecy, you would be the first to apply for assistance, representing yourself a member of the particular order. You say that you served Satan for 50 years, and I guess you are still in the same service, for hypocrites are the best servers. You say you have "found God, and have since been living in the light," which I very much doubt. Secret societies may not be the best thing for man, but the two great curses of the human race are the church and rum; the first manufactures hypocrites, and the latter destroys life. Notoriety appears to be your great object—not the good of your fellowmen. Resp'y,

C. MATHER.

Mr. Mather would have us understand that he is not a secret society man, but he does not say so. The "bray," the "artful dodge," and the hoofs protruding from beneath the "lion's skin," are too familiarly apparent to lead any one astray. He is evidently a specimen brick from the gilded temple of Rimmon, and his attitude towards the church of Christ, and towards one who is a worthy member of His body, is precisely that of all pagan, Christ-excluding religions. "The world will love its own;" and when the system of false worship is exposed, the whole brotherhood cry out, "Great is Diana of the Ephesians!" As David said to Abishai concerning Shimei, so say we of the man who rails against the bride of Christ—"So let him curse." (2 Samuel 16: 10.)

THE WAR ON THE HOUSE OF LORDS.

A dispatch from London, March 13, informs the press that "The House of Commons to-day, by a vote of 147 to 145, and despite the opposition of the government, passed Henry Labouchere's amendment to the speech from the throne, demanding the abolition of the House of Lords."

Mr. John Ramsey, of Ballymony, Ireland, wrote to the Cynosure, October 16, 1893, as follows: "The House of Lords could be abolished only by a revolution, either bloody or bloodless, at the wish of the people." That is, as we understand it, by a radical change in the government of Great Britain—a change that might also involve the Queen on her throne—a change resembling that of Cromwell, in the centuries gone by, when the sovereign was executed and the House of Lords abolished. But is England ripe for such a disaster?

In the Commons, since the foregoing was written, the amendment to the address in reply to the Queen's speech, introduced by Mr. Labouchere, proposing that the House of Lords ought to be abolished, was adopted by a majority of two votes. Seventy-three Irish representatives were among the majority. Eighty thousand members of trades-unions in London, on Sunday, clamored for the removal of the Lords from Parliament. The situation is becoming interesting.

—The next International Convention of the Christian Endeavor Societies is to be held in San Francisco, Cal., in 1895. Rolla V. Watt, of that city, is chairman of the Committee of Arrangements. The societies in California have a stated membership of 30,000.

—The Western Catholic News, whose editor is a prominent member of the "Ults" (a band of 500,000—more or less—Irishmen in the United States), who propose to "go and demand Home Rule for Ireland, and, if it is refused, to go and take it," has for its latest bugbear an invasion of this country by Great Britain—an event "which," it says, "is neither impossible nor improbable." This British "invasion" story will very well match the A. P. A.'s recent forgeries of papal "bulls."

—Writing in relation to the approaching Wisconsin State Anti-secrecy Convention (the call for which appears in this issue of the Cynosure), Rev. J. B. Galloway expresses a wish that Rev. William Fenton, of St. Paul, Minn., may be in attendance at this gathering, truly saying that "he is a host in himself." Bro. Galloway is right. Bro. Fenton was present at the latest Wisconsin State Convention, and it is manifest that when the Spirit of God rests upon him, he is capable of doing great execution in behalf of our reform.

—Opponents of the A. P. A. held a mass-meeting at Milwaukee, last Friday evening. A large number of Roman Catholics occupied seats upon the platform. District Attorney Toohey was the principal speaker, and sharply criticised the objects and principles of the A. P. A. The burden of his address was the danger arising from the anti-Catholic character of that organization. The report of the meeting fails to show any opposition to the secret methods of the A. P. A. Its religious and partisan elements were, however, prominently arraigned.

—Rev. W. B. Stoddard writes from Pittsburgh, Pa., March 16, that he is very busy in the interest of our reform in that vicinity, soliciting subscribers for the Cynosure, making personal visits, etc., and adds: "I find that the interest and support increases from year to year. Our work has a stronger hold on the hearts of the people here than ever before in my knowledge. I have meetings in view, both here and near Philadelphia. I am well and happy, trusting in the Lord for victory daily." For all which we give thanks, gaining renewed courage.

—The grandson of Gov. Wise, of Virginia, under whose administration "Old John Brown of Ossawatomie" was hanged in 1859, was the spokesman of a delegation of schoolboys who waited, with a purpose, on Mayor McClellan, of New York City, the other day. That purpose was to protest against the action of the city council, which had ordered the Irish flag to be displayed on the City Hall on St. Patrick's Day. He said: "No flag but our own should be put on public buildings. We are taught to salute the American flag every morning, and we believe it is the only flag that should be recognized." The boy was right, and his sentiments are those of a patriot, notwithstanding the stand taken by his grandfather during the "late unpleasantness."

—The indiscretion of Gov. Waite came near plunging the whole city of Denver and some other portions of Colorado into mourning last week. The whole affair grew out of the governor's attempt to seat two of his favorites in the offices of Fire and Police Commissioners of the city. This attempt was forcibly resisted by the combined police force, the fire department and several hundred deputy sheriffs. The governor, meeting with this opposition, became alarmed and ordered out the aggregate force of the State National Guard—armed militia—to protect him. The city was then placed under martial law; but the governor's opponents refused to surrender. At one time, had not the prudence of the commanding officers prevented, there was serious danger of a bloody battle between the city forces and the militia. By the governor's request Federal troops were also ordered to Denver. The political question will have to be decided by the highest legal tribunal of the State before the governor's course can be fully vindicated or defeated. In the meantime the troops will keep the civic forces at bay.

—At Indianapolis it has been customary for the teachers, under a tacit requirement, to open the public schools each morning with devotional exercises, and in some districts teachers could not find employment unless they conformed to the requirement. In nearly all the schools the Bible is read each morning, but this did not meet the demands of many districts, and prayer was also required. The matter having been brought to the attention of the State Superintendent of Public Instruction, he, last week, rendered a written decision in which this conclusion is reached: "Clearly the statute and the constitution authorize the reading of the Bible and prayer in the public schools, but it should be done by choice and not by compulsion, and when done it must be done in such a discreet way as not to interfere with rights of conscience. Complete religious liberty is what the constitution guarantees to every one, and this is what should be aimed at by the school board and the teacher." This decision is either a sop thrown to the Roman Catholics, or the superintendent really believes—and truly—that Christianity is not sectarianism, and that it should not be made a cloak for religious intolerance.

THE COLLEGES AND SECRET SOCIETIES.

THE STUDENTS' BUREAU OF CORRESPONDENCE PUBLISHES A VALUABLE SUMMARY.

This organization, in promoting its object of inquiry respecting the secret orders, sent out last year a circular to American colleges requesting an answer to the following questions:

"1. Are secret fraternities prohibited in your institution?
"2. If so, when, and for what reason, was the rule adopted?
"3. If not now, were they ever forbidden?
"4. Are they controlled rather than forbidden?
"5. If organized in your institution, what is their effect on scholarship, discipline and moral character?
"6. Are they, on the whole, beneficial?
"7. Do they tend to promote other secret organizations?
"8. Will you kindly give us your private opinion on the whole secret society system?"

These circulars were sent to the presidents of 340 Protestant institutions. Replies were returned from 185; in some cases two being sent from the same institution.

A summary of these replies shows that among these 185 colleges and universities:—

1. Those having no secret societies number	113
(a) Of this 113, those that prohibit are	59
(b) Those having no societies, and which disapprove or practically forbid, are	33
(c) Same, which give no opinion	21
2. Secret societies are reported in	72
(a) Permitted, but under control, and the objects of more or less disapproval	22
(b) Permitted, under control and encouraged	6
(c) Permitted, but objectionable	22
(d) Permitted and favored	11
(e) Existing, but discouraged	6
(f) Existing, but with indifference	3
(g) Permitted under control	1
(h) Ignored and disliked	1
3. Answering "yes" to question 3	9
4. Answering "yes" to question 6	28
5. Answering "no" to same	45
6. "Doubtful", to same	12
7. Answering "yes" to question 7	20

The replies to the last request are private opinions for the use of the Bureau and not for publication, except by permission of the writer. Responses were in nearly all cases by the presidents of the institutions.

REMARKS.

This is believed to be the most complete report from our institutions on this question. Only one hundred and thirty replies were ever before secured. These were sent to President McFarland of Iowa Wesleyan University in 1890. He presented a summary of them in a paper before the National Teachers' Association, meeting at St. Paul that year; a copy of which, furnished by the author, was printed in the Cynosure of October 23, the same year.

This Bureau report is still incomplete. No reply was sent from at least nineteen institutions which forbid secret societies, the names of several of which do not appear in the report of the U. S. Commissioner of Education. Of the 155 colleges not replying, it is of course impossible to say at present whether they will be fairly represented in the proportions given in the above summary. It might be supposed that a reply would more promptly be given from a president opposed to the "fraternities" than otherwise. But the fact that nineteen holding such sentiments neglected to respond, proves rather that the reports give us a fair estimate of the college fraternity question. So estimating, it is found that about 11 of our colleges are not yet fastened upon by these societies to 7 that are. Of the 72 where the societies exist, either with or without permission and control, they are regarded with more or less objection by 52; while 20 approve or regard them with indifference.

Arranging the figures in another form: prohibit, 59; more harm than good, 45; neither have them, nor like them, 33; total, 137. Or, adding 7 others which find more or less objection, 144 presidents object up to the point of prohibition. Only 17 approve wholly; 11 more think the good overbalances. Setting aside the 24 which give no opinion, there are 28 which think the societies beneficial on the whole, and 133 which think otherwise: a proportion of nearly 1 to 5. This estimate is stronger against the fraternities than Dr. McFarland's.

Several of the presidents think it no use to antagonize the student lodges unless a general movement is made. On the contrary, several have proved that this can be done. There is no doubt that a firm and vigorous administration in an institution will always succeed in clearing its halls of this evil!

But more than all influences which should be working for righteousness in our colleges is the student sentiment and student conscience. This will develop strongly and righteously as the truth is given and the Spirit of the Lord blesses. The Students' Bureau of Correspondence promises to be a helpful agency in this work. It was the conception of a student in Chicago Theological Seminary. It aims to get the facts respecting the nature, aims and work of the secret societies before the young men and women in the colleges of America, assured that an honest statement of the facts will have its effect upon the conviction of students. These are soon to be our leaders in politics, business and religion. No opportunity of fixing right principles and promoting a right conscience on this grave question of the secret lodges can we afford to lose. K.

THE HOME.

THE HILLS OF THE LORD.

God ploughed one day with an earthquake,
And drove his furrows deep!
The huddling plains upstarted;
The hills were all a-leap.

But that is the mountains' secret;
Aye, hidden in their breast.
God's peace is everlasting,
Are the dream words of their rest.

He hath made them the haunt of beauty,
The home-elect of his grace.
He spreadeth his mornings on them;
His sunsets light their face.

His thunders tread in music
Of footfalls echoing long.
And carry majestic greeting
Around the silent throng.

His words bring messages to them;
Wild storm news from the main.
They sing it down to the valleys,
In the love-song of the rain.

Green tribes from afar come trooping,
And over the uplands flock.
He weaveth the zones together
In robes for his risen rock.

There are nurseries for young rivers,
Nests for his flying cloud,
Homesteads for new-born races,
Masterful, free and proud.

The people of tired cities
Come up to their shrines to pray;
God freshens again within them
As he passes by all day.

And lo! I have caught their secret—
The beauty deeper than all.
This faith—that life's hard moments,
When the jarring shadows fall,

Are but God ploughing his mountains.
And the mountains yet shall be
The source of his grace and freshness,
And his peace everlasting to me.

AN EXPERIENCE IN THE INQUIRY ROOM.

While conducting a series of evangelistic meetings, some years since, in a certain Western city, we were obliged to use two rooms in order to accommodate the inquirers, they were so numerous; for God was wonderfully honoring the testimony, labors and faith of his people. One evening, while busily occupied in directing the personal work in one of these rooms, and dealing with inquirers, a messenger informed me that a gentleman named John Ewing, in very great distress of mind and agony of soul, was in the other room wanting to see me. As soon as I was through with the case I then had in hand, I hurried over to the other room.

I found Mr. Ewing in a corner of the room, behind the door, on his knees before a chair. His hands were laid open upon the chair, palms downward. His face was turned upward, was ashen-hued and covered with great drops of perspiration. He was the perfect picture of despair. I dropped upon my knees by his side, and the following conversation took place:

"I understand, Mr. Ewing, you wish to see me."

"Yes, sir!" he replied.

"What is your trouble?"

"Oh, sir, I am such a great sinner!"

I said: "Praise the Lord!"

I can never forget the look that he gave me as he said: "I see nothing for which to praise the Lord."

"Doubtless that is so," I responded; "but that is because 'the eyes of your understanding' are not 'enlightened that ye may know what is the hope of his calling.' There is hope for the man who believes himself to be a great sinner. Jesus came not 'to call the righteous, but sinners, to repentance.' 'They that be whole need not a physician, but they that are sick.' Do you not know, Mr. Ewing, that we have a very great and gracious Saviour?"

"Yes," he said; "but my sins are heinous and very black."

"But," I responded, "Jesus is able also to save them to the uttermost that come unto God by him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them."

"That may be all true," he replied, "but I am the vilest sinner in this city. I have sinned knowingly, and with a high hand."

I opened my Bible to Isaiah 53, and laid it upon the chair before him. I asked: "Do you believe the Bible is true?"

"I do," was the quick response.

I then said: "Will you notice carefully the three things stated in the sixth verse of this chapter? First, 'All we like sheep have gone astray.' Do you believe that?" I asked.

"Yes, I know I have wandered like a lost sheep."

"Second, 'We have turned every one to his own way.' Do you believe that?"

"Oh, yes, sir. I know I have not walked in God's way."

"Third, 'And the Lord hath laid on him (Jesus) the iniquity of us all.' Do you believe that also?"

He responded, hesitatingly and evasively, "I have been the wickedest manupon earth."

"So, then," I said, "you believe the first and second statements of that verse, but not the third?"

"Oh, sir, I believe it all."

"Are you certain of it?"

"Yes, sir, but I am such a great sinner."

"Do you really believe God laid your iniquities on Jesus? It says that, does it not?"

"Yes, it says, 'And the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all.' Well, I believe it."

"With your whole heart?"

"Yes, with my whole heart."

"Well," I then asked, "where are your iniquities?"

"On me, sir; and they are very great and heavy."

"And you say, Mr. Ewing, 'I believe the Bible is true;' and yet, when God says he 'hath laid on him the iniquities of us all,' 'who his ownself bear our sins in his own body on the tree,' and thus hath 'put away sin by the sacrifice of himself,' you say, in effect: 'It is not so; my sins are yet on me.' In other words, God says he laid your sins on Jesus, and you say it is not so; and yet claim to believe the Bible."

"But, sir," he answered, "I do believe God's Word."

"Very well," I said; "let us look at it again. God says: 'And the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all,' does he not?"

"Yes, that's how it reads."

"Well, then, where are your iniquities?"

With somewhat of hesitation, he said: "I suppose, sir, they must be upon Christ."

"You suppose so? don't you know so?"

"Well, but I am such a very great sinner."

"Very well, then, I'll read it your way, and we'll see how it sounds. Will you listen?"

"Certainly."

Again I read: "'All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all,' excepting John Ewing."

Springing to his feet, he shouted: "That's not there, sir! It doesn't say that!"

I replied: "I know it is not. But that's the way you have been reading it all the while, in spite of my every effort to get you to see what it really does say."

"I see it! I see it!" he said, vehemently and exultingly. "He did lay my sins on Jesus! He did! He did!" and he clapped his hands again and again in the ecstacy of his joy, and shouted aloud the praises of God.—Rev. Dr. Munhall, in the Independent.

JUDGE COFFIN'S FIRST CASE.

The following story is told of Timothy C. Coffin, who was a long time judge of the New Bedford district: When a very young man, he was retained in a case of sufficient importance to bring out almost every resident of the town, so that the little New Bedford courthouse was packed when court was opened that morning. Coffin had been secured as counsel by the defendant. Although it was his first attempt in open court, he had made little or no preparation, thinking that he could get through somehow or other when the time came. Thus, when the counsel for the defendant came into court that morning, he was greatly surprised, and no less agitated, to see the big crowd and realize the wide public interest in the trial at hand. He saw that he had looked upon the case too lightly. The prosecution was strong, and he had made not even a slight preparation.

To lose the case meant the loss of a hoped-for reputation. Could he afford to commit this blunder by displaying his ignorance of the case? How could he get out of it? These were a few of the questions that are known to have flashed through the young lawyer's head, for afterward he himself told of the awful perplexity of the hour. Being a shrewd inventor, he devised a plan. As soon as the court had been called to order and the crier had said his little say, he arose and asked for a postponement of the trial, on the ground that he had just received a telegram announcing the sudden and fatal illness of his mother, who resided at Nantucket.

Scarcely had the words of this appeal proceeded from the lips of young Coffin, when an elderly woman quietly arose in the balcony of the court-room and gave utterance to these words, "Timothy, Timothy, how many times have I chastised thee for lying?"

Timothy recognized the sound of that voice only too well. It was that of his mother. This being Timothy's first public case, the old lady had secretly come up to New Bedford to see how well her son would do. Her presence was of course totally unknown to him. The further developments need not be recorded here. Suffice it to say that Timothy Coffin in after-years made sure that his excuses would not be thrown back at him by any member of his own family.—Anonymous.

A REFLECTION.

I saw a pretty bit of conjugal felicity recently. Possibly some other people may share my enjoyment of it if I reproduce it as well as may be in black and white.

An old gentleman who had long retired from a business which had fairly "feathered the nest" for old age, came from his morning walk. His wife met him at the door—her custom for more than fifty years—and soon they were seated in their respective easy chairs.

"Where do you think I went this morning, mother?"

"As far as any youth of your time, I dare say," she said proudly.

"I went up to the old neighborhood, mother."

They looked straight into each other's eyes in sympathy, and for a little while were silently thinking.

"Yes," he resumed, "I walked up and down past the house where we lived so long, where Anne was married, and where so many things happened. Then I went into Pemberton's grocery to rest."

"That was a taste of old time, to be sure," said mother.

"Pemberton was there himself. Dear, dear, how old he looks! He introduced me to a fine-looking customer, and what do you think he said about us?"

"Oh, something about the days 'when we were first acquainted,' I presume."

"He told the gentlemen that he served us with goods for forty years, and never had a chance to send us a bill."

"That was a blessed truth."

"And I told the gentleman that ever since the first week we went to housekeeping I had given you the allowance of money, much or little, as I could afford; and you had kept our expenses inside always."

"Yes, dear."

"I told him about the happy day when you surprised me with the bead purse you had knit for me—seems as if I could see you now, knitting every evening and trying to turn the beads outside, just so easy—and I did not guess that it was to hold fifty dollars in gold pieces which you had saved out of the year's house money."

"Well, you had not missed it from the table, or anywhere else?"

"No, no; always enough to eat, and the house as tasty as the housekeeper."

"Well, husband, perhaps there were not as many temptations for a housewife to spend money in those old-fashioned times."

"Perhaps not, Jane. But new-fashioned times make long faces and long bills and short lives, I notice."

Now this picture ought to be etched upon young lives—love and confidence which had walked hand in hand through fifty-five years of married life, with a "pay as you go" principle, which walked while others rode, to the sure end of comfort in old age. They had met many riders coming back on foot, as far as the poorhouse, or some condition of homelessness and dependence upon the favor of friends.

This is a prime maxim of Bible lore: "Owe no man anything, but to love one another;" and it should be accepted as one of the keys to "good housekeeping."—The Pacific.

KEEPING OUR EYES OPEN.

By keeping our eyes open, and judging things upon Scriptural principles, we may often be forewarned in our dealings with certain characters. One man cannot see further into a millstone than another, and yet shrewdness sees where the ordinary observer is in the dark. A prudent man, with the fear of God before his eyes, is almost a prophet. Two or three instances are before our mind at this moment.

A gentleman went carefully into his stable where his horse was placed to bait, and he saw for himself that the proper feed of corn was in the manger. In a few minutes' time he was in the stable again, and the oats were gone. He taxed the hostler with taking them out, and remained while he saw his nag eat up his fair portion. How did he know that the hostler would steal corn? He had heard him cursing, and therefore he knew that he would steal.

A friend met the deacon of a church in the street, a man whom he much esteemed. The aforesaid deacon begged the loan of £100, and the friend would have lent it to him with pleasure; but he said: "You know me as an old pilgrim. I am, I trust, quite beyond temptation." The money was refused, for the friend said to himself: "Past temptation? Past temptation? Why, he must be quite ignorant of his own heart. He must surely be a hypocrite." And so he was. He knew that he was hopelessly involved, even when he was seeking a loan from one who could not afford to lose the money; before the day was over he had failed. "Pride goeth before destruction." "A prating fool shall fail." His Bible had made our friend wise, and he was saved from loss.

A man who stood high in the city observed with great satisfaction that he had in a single morning cleared £30,000 by speculation. A brother merchant remarked that he ought to be very grateful to Providence for such good fortune, whereupon the successful merchant snapped his finger and said: "Providence! pooh! that for Providence! I can do a great deal better for myself than Providence can do for me." He who heard the observation walked away, and resolved never to deal with such a man again except upon cash principles, for he felt sure that a crash would come sooner or later. Great was the indignation of the man who stood high in the city when he was told, "If you and I are to have dealings it must be on strictly ready-money terms." He was insulted; he would not endure it; he would go to another house. That other house welcomed his custom, and in due time it was repaid by losing many thousands.

A tradesman chose a shopman from seeing him pick up a pin; Rowland Hill would button up his coat when he heard a man swear, for he did not want his pocket picked; thus, for good or for evil, little things may be tests of character. To deal with persons who have no respect for the Sabbath is always risky; to marry a man who can repeat a lewd story is eminently perilous; to buy goods of tradesmen who are "really giving them away," is to invite deception; and to trust those who flatter you is to court delusion. Do you meet with one who tells you many of the secret faults of others? Mind that you show him none of your own which you would not wish to publish. Does he tell you what others have said of you? Then say nothing of others which you would not wish him to report; for as sure as you live he will report all that you say, with additions. All dogs that fetch, will carry.

By observing such things as these, men may be saved from deceptions. The difference between one man and another, in point of prudence, mainly arises from the fact that one man learns from his blunders and another does not. When we are once taken in by a person, we ought to take his measure so exactly that he will not be able to do it again. No mouse can be excused if it is caught twice by the same cat. Yet as long as the world stands there will remain some in it who can never see further than the end of their noses.—C. H. Spurgeon.

THE PLEASANT PATH.

There is a blissful path of peace,
Winding through meadows cool and green;
There care and grief forever cease;
There flowers of hope and joy are seen.

The path enclosed on either side
With evergreens of faith and prayer—
Secluded thus from tempest's tide,
A heavenly calm breathes in the air.

Bright flowers bedeck the verdant lawn,
And melody of singing bird;
Harbinger of a brighter dawn
Within the new-born soul is heard.

For weary trav'lers there is found,
Within this sacred and quiet dell,
Overflowing from out the ground
Of living water a full well.

The sky serene and blue above,
Studded with stars of Bethlehem,
Seems as a canopy of love,
Enshrouding all who enter in.

Every disorder of the soul
Is healed with magic power,
Now from sin's corruption made whole,
And sweetly kept through every hour.

Sometimes the flower of bleeding-heart
Lies drooping 'neath the grass;
Air of love divine heals the smart,
Wooing to life as it will pass.

Would'st learn the secret of the path
So delightful while here to tread?
Would you know the true life of faith,
And partake of heaven's own bread?

God's loving Son points out the way,
Turn to the promise of his Word;
The path becomes as light as day
To those who walk with Christ, the Lord.

TEMPERANCE.

STUMBLING BLOCKS OR STEPPING STONES?

The following is a brief synopsis of a recent address by Miss E. P. Nichols, corresponding secretary of the Rhode Island W. C. T. U. Read it carefully and then decide for yourself the question, "Where do I stand?"

"Fathers, are you setting good examples for your children? Are you stumbling blocks or stepping stones in their paths? They tell us that it is useless to attempt the prohibition of the liquor traffic, and that the best we can hope for is restriction and regulation. Well, they have been restricting and regulating in New York, until they have one saloon for every 100 inhabitants.

"Think of it. At a low estimate, every rumshop there takes in $10,000 per year. Divide that amount among 100 people, and you can readily see how conditions would be improved by abolishing those saloons. And such is the wisdom of man. No wonder that, with God, it is counted as foolishness.

"God has taught us that the only effectual remedy for an evil is to prohibit it. Let us stand firmly for the right, as he has given us to see it, always remembering that it is ever the darkest just before dawn. We have no reason to be discouraged, if success has not come as speedily as we had hoped. More and more men are leaving their wicked and corrupt political parties, and coming to us. Every man, woman, or child, who stands up for principle, and speaks with no uncertain sound, is a stepping stone to help on the glorious victory, that, in God's own good time, awaits us.

"In this contest, let none of us waver. We should remember that we are being watched. Let us stand by our leaders. Have you ever thought what might happen if those leaders should fall back, or go down, before the storm of ridicule and persecution to which they are being subjected?

"This is, indeed, a testing time. Everything is undergoing the process of disintegration. God is shaking us up—house cleaning as it were. The good is being separated from the evil. Woe unto him, who, for policy's sake, or for any other reason, shall be found among the wavering, when God comes to separate his sheep from the goats.

"If the outcome of the present financial distress, in this and other countries, which is mainly attributable to the rum traffic, shall be the abolition of the saloon, our terrible chastening will not have been in vain.

"The person who stands firmly for principle is impervious to the assaults of the wicked and corrupt. Let us be steadfast ourselves, and thus help others to stand for principle and for God's righteous truth. Let us be stepping stones, not stumbling blocks.

"What inconsistency do we see among professed Christians. Think of a man, who warns others against the evil of strong drink, and prays to God to build up Sabbath-schools and hasten the coming of his kingdom on earth; and who yet is all the time, by his vote and influence, helping to build up the rum traffic! With one hand he is building, while with the other he is tearing down much faster than he builds."

A LITTLE PLAIN TALKING.

The Indianapolis Right and Freedom, the organ of the saloon men of Indiana, says:

"The saloon man is abused, reviled and his family ostracized from society, boycotted in business, spit upon with the saliva of contempt. By whom? The dishonest professing Christian—the duplicity acting and false living, imitator Christian Prohibitionist. If the sale of liquor is wrong, if it is injurious to drink a glass of beer, why is it that the 60,000,000 people of America do not wipe it out of existence? The majority of the people of the United States are professedly God-fearing and church-attending people.

"Is not the church then in colleague with the whisky element, or are they honest and sincere church members? Why, think of a preacher running for the governorship of the great State of Indiana and being afraid to open his mouth against liquor selling! Is he an honest and sincere Christian, or is he a hypocrite? Who knows where to find such people? The honest and sincere Christian we admire, but the hypocrite—never!"

Drink is a greater destroying force than all other physical evils combined.—Henry Ward Beecher, D. D.

The real evil in our community is the drinking of intoxicating liquor.—Hon. O. H. Platt, United States Senator.

The most determined evil which afflicts the clerical force and the officers of the government is the habit of using intoxicating liquors.—Hon. L. M. Morrill in United States Senate.

Strong drink, by whatever name the demon is styled, in whatever way it presents itself—this prevents our success. Remove this obstacle and our cause will be onward and our labors will be blessed.—John Bright.

COMMENTS BY E. E. FLAGG.

1. Jacob's prayer.—vs. 9–12. Jacob was in sore trouble. He had no reason to suppose that Esau had lost his desire for revenge. On the contrary there was more reason to think that it might have strengthened with the passing years. When he first fled from the face of his justly incensed brother, he had only his own life to think of. Now the case was vastly different. He had a numerous family, who might all be cut off at one blow; and this circumstance added greatly to his distress. Jacob's petition is, throughout, a wonderful specimen of prevailing prayer. The beginning is to be noted. "O God of my father Abraham," etc. Perhaps Jacob, with the remembrance of the wrong done to Esau, did not feel that he could as yet personally call upon the Jehovah of his fathers as his God. "Which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country," etc. Jacob was now following out God's commands. Had he remained where he was he would have been in no danger from Esau. This is one of the most powerful arguments that we can plead when seeking aid from God:—that we are in the way of duty. The strongest faith always goes with the most single-hearted obedience. We need never to be afraid to meet any danger of difficulty into which God sends us. Jacob's faith had been strengthened by the vision of angels at Mahanaim, and by remembering how faithfully God had kept his covenant with him, unworthy as he felt himself of even the least of divine mercies. This profound humility seems to be a newly-developed trait in the patriarch's character. Though the vision at Bethel filled him with dread and awe, the vow which he there made shows little trace of that sense of sin which he now shows. One characteristic of prevailing prayer is that it specializes: "Deliver me, I pray thee, from the hand of my brother . . . for I fear him." We should win more victories in prayer if we were more simple as well as more honest, asking God for just the things that we want, and not asking him for things we do not at heart care for, simply because we feel we ought to want them, though this may be true. We are very apt to crave the lowest blessings which God has to give us, instead of seeking the highest. But he "desires truth in the inward parts." If we ask honestly for what we really want, and get it, our faith and spirituality will grow, and we shall begin to reach after higher and more enduring good. "And thou saidst, I will surely do thee good." He pleads God's own word of promise for his last and strongest argument. One of the reasons why we ought to be familiar with every part of God's holy Word, is that we may know how rich and full are his "exceeding precious promises," and have more power in prayer.

2. Jacob wrestles with an angel.—vs. 24–26. Jacob had divided his family and servants into two companies, so that if Esau should attack one the other might escape, and sent them over the ford by night, while he himself remained alone behind, that he might agonize with God for deliverance undisturbed. That he had prayed once was not enough. His was the prayer without ceasing that wins the victory. While thus engaged he felt the presence of a celestial antagonist. Some have thought this not an actual occurrence, but a vision, like his dream at Bethel. The lameness from which he suffered, probably all his life (see verse 32), seems to contradict this theory. The angel's strength was so great that with one touch he could dislocate Jacob's thigh, yet he suffers him to prevail in the contest. "Wrestling believers," says Henry, "may obtain glorious victories, and yet come off with broken bones, for when they are weak then are they strong." "Let me go, for the day breaketh;" the time to begin the day's active duties. This could make no difference with an angel who was not restricted in his work by mortal conditions, but Jacob had his family, and his flocks and herds to look after. Still the argument does not prevail to make him loose his hold. Many hurry over family prayers or omit them altogether because they want to push their work on the farm, or in the house or shop, forgetting that it is God's blessing on their work which will make it prosperous. "I will not let thee go until thou bless me," has been the language of all who have done great things through prayer. "And he said, Thy name shall no more be called Jacob"—that is a supplanter—"but Israel," a prince of God. Note the vast difference. One name was in itself suggestive of trickery and craft, full of dishonorable and shameful associations. The other made him a prince in God's family:—one who had power with God and with men. He who has power with God, will in the best and highest sense have power with his fellowmen. Solomon says: "A brother offended is harder to be won than a strong city;" yet Esau, though breathing out vengeance against him when they parted, was transformed into a lamb when the meeting, so much dreaded, took place. "When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him." The refusal of the angel to tell his name may be taken as a rebuke to that impertinent curiosity which seeks to pry into the hidden things of God, when the knowledge would do us no real good.

Literature.

Funk and Wagnalls' New Standard Dictionary.

The first volume of this new lexicon is one of the finest specimens of book-making yet attempted in the United States, not only in the extent of philological research involved, but also in the completeness of the results attained. As compared with similar works of equal pretension to perfection in these respects, this Dictionary stands a step in advance, since it presents nearly 75,000 more words and terms than the "Century," and more than double those in "Webster's International."

About four years have elapsed since the labor expended upon this enterprise was begun, and nearly 1,000 persons have found employment in its compilation, as editors, specialists, and professional searchers for appropriate quotations and definitions. The entire cost of preparing the work for publication will approximate a million dollars. These figures indicate the determination of the publishers to make this Dictionary as perfect as possible in all respects.

Scholars will be pleased with the many advantages that it presents, some of which are here designated: Where a word has two or more meanings, the most common has been given the preference in position. The scientific alphabet of the American Philological Association, adopted also by the American Spelling Reform Association, has been used in giving the pronunciation of words. This secures valuable aid in determining exact pronunciation. Disputed spellings and pronunciations have been referred to fifty expert philologists of various nationalities for correction and final adjustment. Particular attention has been given to obtaining the true spellings of geographical names, according to official authorities. The spelling of many words in chemistry has been simplified, in harmony with the wishes of chemical experts. Reference to the sources of quotations wherein certain words occur, indicating their meaning, has been carefully noted. The recognition of needless new literary terms has been designedly avoided. The work of preparing definitions has been thorough, introducing new distinctions; and each set of words has been defined or approved by a representative of each class to which especial words belong. Synonyms and antonyms have been judiciously treated. Class-words are grouped with great fullness and precision. Particular attention has been paid to the correct compounding of words, reducing this specialty to a scientific system. The proper divisions of words at the ends of lines, by printers, are also well defined. Particular merit also attaches to the pictorial illustrations—some of which are highly artistic in design and color—which have been made expressly for this Dictionary. These and several other marked advantages will be apparent to those who give the work a careful examination.

College professors at Yale, Harvard, Amherst, and Columbia, in this country, and Oxford in Great Britain, and also the Smithsonian Institution at Washington, D. C., have given this Dictionary a hearty approval, as have, likewise, eminent statesmen, scholars, authors, and the editors of standard periodical publications in Europe and throughout this country. Altogether, until a better work of this character shall appear on the market, the "Standard" is sure to maintain the superiority which it now claims by virtue of its excellence.

The "Standard" is published by the Funk & Wagnalls Company, 18-20 Astor Place, New York City, and also in London, Eng. It is sold only by subscription, and furnished in either the two-volume or the one-volume form, as follows: Two volume at $7.50, $8.50, and $11 per volume; per set at $15.00, $17.00 and $22.00; single volume at $12.00, $14.00 and $18.00; bound, respectively, in either half-russia or full-russia leather, or in full morocco. The binding establishes the difference in prices.

Current Periodicals.

There is no end to the interest that centers in Astronomy. If the subjects for literary study are innumerable, those of this science above all sciences are inexhaustible, and far better deserve careful consideration. These reflections naturally arise when we turn attention to the periodical information contained in Astronomy and Astro-Physics, published ten times a year at Carleton College, Northfield, Minn., and ably edited by Wm. W. Payne and Geo. E. Hale, and their associates. The March issue is replete with information that will commend itself to all who love to roam among the stars. The topics treated possess not only interest, but great variety, and are based upon professional intelligence and investigation. They treat of general astronomy, astro-physics, current celestial phenomena, and astronomical news and notes, furnished by a dozen educated contributors. The annual subscription price is $4.

The Social Economist for March treats of current topics that invite attention from all thinking and reading individuals. These include: The Discussion of Sound Economic Questions in Congress, under the leadership of Hon. Thos. B. Read, of Maine; The Census Distribution of Wealth; The Triumph of the Eight-Hour Labor System in England and elsewhere; the Social Ministry of Wealth; From Desert Herding to Intensive Farming—a review of agricultural advancement; The Political Crisis in Japan; State Banks of Issue; The Discussion of Social Economics in popular magazines of the day, etc. The Editor's Crucible—by far the most interesting department of this comprehensive periodical—contains a spirited summary of economic notes, and with the usual book notices completes a choice number. Published at 34 Union Square, New York City. Price, 25 cents.

The Journal of Hygiene for March has for its opening paper an interesting description of A Scottish (Workingman's) Palace of Industry and Health. A new serial, Hygiene of the Nose, is begun. The editor writes of Running as an Exercise; Tyndall on a Clear Brain; Keeping the Body at the Top of its Condition; Beneficial Effects of More Fruit as Food; Preaching at 92. Jennie Chandler contributes a paper on Economy in the Use of Our Strength. Topics of the Month embrace: How They Live in Paris; Food and Drink; Heating Houses; Bread Carriers; Amusements; Anarchists; A Letter from Ceylon; Music for the Poor Sick; Cost of Tobacco, etc. This magazine, edited and published by Dr. M. L. Holbrook, 46 East 21st street, New York City, at $1 a year, deserves a liberal support and a wide circulation.

McClure's Magazine for March opens with a full-page portrait of Herbert Spencer, who contributes an illustrated sketch of his fellow-philosopher, Tyndall. There is also a pictorial character study of John Ruskin at Home; a good description, illustrated, of M. Bertillon's System of Identifying Criminals; Human Documents—portraits, at different portions of their lives, of Andrew Lang, John T. Trowbridge and Renan; The Glamour of the Archie; Town Lot No. 1303, a story by Octave Thanet; The Legs of Sister Ursula, by Rudyard Kipling; The Ebb Tide, by R. L. Stevenson and L. Osbourne, continued; Prairie Children, etc. Published by S. S. McClure (Ltd), 743 Broadway, New York City. Price, 15 cents.

The Cottage Hearth for March has several interesting tales, sketches and poems, freely illustrated, by as many contributors, as follows: In the 'Squire's Hall; The Last Tramp; Fate, a poem; Why the Door was Never Altered; In a Pullman; Through Uncle's Telescope; Hush, a poem; An American Girl in a Chinese Theater; An Ancient Telephone; The Confession of a Maniac; The Mysterious Voyage of the Daphne; and the usual well-filled domestic departments. Published by W. A. Wilde & Co., 25 Bromfield street, Boston. Price, 15 cents.

The Mission Field, which with the March issue begins its seventh volume, is published monthly at 25 East 22d street, New York City, by the Mission Boards of the Reformed Church in America. Its contents embrace: Tidings from Many Lands; At Home and Abroad; Women's Work; Endeavor Notes; Little Missionaries; College and Seminary Notes, and News from the Churches. The quantity and quality of the matters presented carry a strong recommendation.

CALCIMINE.

Set a pound of glue in cold water over night, and in the morning heat and stir it until it is perfectly dissolved. Mix the whiting with hot water, pour into it the dissolved glue, and add hot water till it is thick cream; stir well together. Apply warm with a calcimine brush, brushing it well in and finishing as you go on. Stop all holes and cracks with plaster of paris mixed with water before putting on the calcimine. Warm skim milk used for mixing with the whiting makes glue unnecessary.

HEALTH HINTS.

It lies within the power of every one to be a mental healer. The position requires no special training and every such person is the physician's ally. He sees everything through the colored glasses of an unselfish and hopeful contentment.

The person who is contented and happy digests his food with greater ease; he exercises with more buoyancy; he does better work. He may become ill and require a physician, but his chances for recovery are better because of his previous good health and his present hopefulness.

The benefit derived from a "change of scene" is universally admitted. The novelty of the new surroundings excites a pleasure which drives one's thoughts from self. Here the connection between happiness and healthfulness is obvious.

It is not always easy to be patient and to push cheerfully to its close an uncongenial task; but it is the only wholesome and healthful method of working and living.

A constant giving way to anger or to any other of the passions is distinctly detrimental to the physical health and not infrequently hastens death.

The habit of being happy is invaluable to its possessor. If not always a passport to perfect health it is a valuable help toward it.—Selected.

Mrs. Judge Peck Tells How She Was Cured

Sufferers from Dyspepsia should read the following letter from Mrs. H. M. Peck, wife of Judge Peck, a justice at Tracy, Cal., and a writer connected with the Associated Press:

"By a deep sense of gratitude for the great benefit I have received from the use of Hood's Sarsaparilla, I have been led to write the following statement for the benefit of sufferers who may be similarly afflicted. For 15 years I have been a great sufferer from dyspepsia and Heart Trouble.

Almost everything I ate would distress me. I tried different treatments and medicines, but failed to realize relief. Two years ago a friend prevailed upon me to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. The first bottle I noticed helped me, so I continued taking it. It did me so much good that my friends spoke of the improvement. I have received such great benefit from it that Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim.

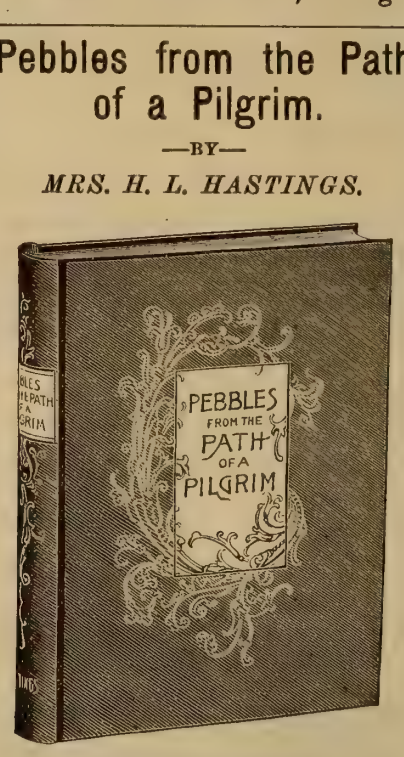
—BY—

MRS. H. L. HASTINGS.



This remarkable collection of stories from the eventful life of a Green Mountain girl has been pronounced "more fascinating than any romance." A member of Congress writes: "'Pebbles' has been read by me with great interest. The introductory chapter has followed me into dreams. My copy is read to pieces by the family, and borrowed to death by the neighbors." An editor says: "Surely the faith that 'obtained promises, wrought righteousness, and stopped the mouth of lions,' must have been given in large measure to the writer of this truly remarkable book....No family library should be without it." "'Pebbles,'" says the Christian Cynosure, "is such a book as Christian parents are always glad to put on their center-tables."

"Pebbles from the Path of a Pilgrim" is a large and beautiful book of over 300 pages, printed on heavy book paper, from clear open type, and is profusely illustrated. It is artistically bound in handsome cloth, with fancy panels, and specially attractive side and back cover designs. Price, $1.50.

SEVEN YEARS AMONG THE FREEDMEN.
Revised and Enlarged.

BY MARIA WATERBURY.

Finely Illustrated 196 Pages.....75cts.

The first edition of this book has "gone like hot cakes," and a second edition with more of the same sort has been loudly called for and is now ready for delivery. The press, the pulpit, the educator, the reformer, the masses, have bidden it welcome and Godspeed. We quote a few good words from sundry sources: EARNEST CHRISTIAN: "Publish the book for the good it will do."

Dr. Talmage, in the Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, for February 11th, says: "A helpful little volume, just out, for the workers is, 'Seven Years among the Freedmen,' by Miss M. Waterbury, Polo, Ill.,—a teacher well known to many in Illinois—detailing the quaint and thrilling scenes of her experience—'truth stranger,' oftimes, 'than fiction. One day the chore-man came to Miss M. Waterbury, to be taught a prayer; all the scholars had a prayer to say and he wanted one. John was past middle life and very ignorant. The teacher began the Lord's Prayer, a sentence at a time, explaining as the lesson progressed. 'Thy kingdom come' was all right. 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors.' 'What dat mean?' said he. 'That you must forgive everybody, or God will not forgive you.' 'Stop, teacher, can't do dat,' and he went away. After vacation he appeared, saying: 'Now go on wid de prayer. I dun 'orgive him. Old massar once gib me five hundred lashes, and hit me wid a crow bar, an' t' row me out fur dead, and I met him down de street, an' wouldn't speak at him, but to-day I met him an' aid 'How d'ye?' Now go on wid dat prayer'!"

Inter Ocean: "A Splendid Book. Seven Years Among Freedman is a volume of 494 pages by Miss M. Waterbury, of Polo, Ills., who has spent seven years as a teacher among the freedmen in Mississippi and Alabama. It is a series of sketches telling very simply and graphically the life led by Northern teachers in the South. It bears all the evidences of truthfulness and if it fails to impress the reader with the manhood and dignity of the old ruling class of the South, it is perhaps because the whole truth is told. One reading the book will stop to ask, Why not send missionaries to the white people of the South? They seem to need it more than the blacks."

Journal, Freeport, Ills.: "We are indebted to Mrs. Lila L. Buckley, of this city, for a copy of this interesting volume. The efforts made to elevate the freedmen of the South is one of the most important and deserving charities of the present time, far excelling any effort to elevate the heathen of foreign lands, and it should have the aid of all charitable people in this country. ....The proceeds of sales is devoted to the work of elevating the freedmen of the South, and we trust that every one to whom Miss Waterbury applies will purchase a copy of the book, which is in itself fully worth the price. Miss Waterbury's grandfather, Rev. Calvin Waterbury, was the first Presbyterian minister in Freeport, and it was by his efforts that the First Presbyterian church in Freeport was established.

Polo, (Ills.,) Press: "Seven Years Among the Freedmen. Our townswoman Miss Maria Waterbury, the past winter, prepared for publication an account of some of her singular experiences in the "sixties" among the freedmen of Mississippi. Miss Waterbury and Miss Ford, both of this place, did grand work in those years and deserve no small mead of praise for their heroic sacrifices.

Talks to Sunday-School Teachers.

By Rev. J. G. Terrill. 12mo, 200 pages, bound in fine cloth.....75

This book is the result of twenty-five years of experience in Sunday-school and treats of: 1. The Sunday-school organization and management. 2. Methods of work. 3. Studies in human nature. 4. Rules of Interpretation as applied to the Bible. 5. Illustrative exercises for primary classes and children's meetings. In the style of presentation, subject matter and price of the book, the wants of the officers and teachers of the ordinary Sunday-school are kept in view.

S. S. Times:—A very comprehensive book. N. Y. Independent:—A sensible manual for the average Sunday-school teacher. Evan. Mess.:—We have been very favorably impressed with the book, because it is so intensely practical. The subject is systematically treated, and leaders of teacher's meetings can not do better than adopt it as a text-book and devote half an hour of each session to teaching the theory and practice of teaching as here systematized. Christian at Work:—Any school that will adopt this book generally and carry forward its work or doctrines here laid down will not be long in developing into a model school and reaping the harvest of a rich fruitage. Herald and Presbyter:—These Talks are well attested in their profitableness and excellence. Buffalo Advocate:—A plain, practical, common sense book on a very important subject. The author has had wide experience in this field of work. He knows thoroughly the ground over which he would lead others, and possesses the happy faculty of packing a great deal of valuable information as to matter and manner of teaching into this little hand-book. We commend it to the attention of all Sunday-school workers. Religious Teloscope:—We are pleased with the plan and treatment of the subjects throughout, and are sure that the diligent Sunday-school teacher who longs for more thorough equipment, will find in this book a helper of great value. Illustrated Christian Weekly:—The author talks from observation and experience, and talks well.

Sermons of Rev. John McNeill,

12mo. cloth, 416 pages, $1.50.

The fame of this Scottish Spurgeon, as he is very generally called, is becoming as wide-spread as the English tongue. The secret of his power over the masses, has been discussed on both sides of the Atlantic. If one may judge from these printed sermons the secret lies in a homely and pointed putting of the old truths of the Gospel in plain Anglo-saxon. There is evidence of study, but more the study of human nature, and particularly the human heart, than that of books, other than the Book of books—with this volume Mr. McNeill is evidently in love. With unquestioned faith he believes the writen word, and preaches it with an earnestness born of conviction.

FARM NOTES.

Thrifty growth causes fruit trees to slough off the dead unused growth in which sap does not circulate. Make trees thrifty by liberal feeding, and there will be no rough bark on them to furnish a harbor for the codling moth. Stripping the rough bark from the apple trees will doubtless expose many cocoons of this insect and insure their destruction, as they will perish when drenched by spring rains, as they most certainly will be if uncovered from their hiding place. We do not regard this rough bark as of much advantage for protecting the trunks of trees from cold in winter or the sun's rays at all seasons. If it were necessary young trees would be easily injured, whereas they are generally more healthful than are old trees.—American Cultivator.

In Wisconsin experiments the effect of the hard wood ashes and bone meal fed to pigs with corn was to save about 28 per cent of the corn in producing 100 pounds of grain, live weight. By feeding the bone meal the strength of the thigh bone was doubled; ashes nearly doubled the strength of the bones. These experiments point to the great value of hardwood ashes for hog feeding, and show that they should be regularly fed. Bone meal is even better than ashes, but the latter are sufficient, and do not usually cost anything.

Clover hay, cut green and well cured, is recommended for poultry. Have it cut in half-inch lengths in a feed-cutter, turn boiling water on it, then thicken, after it has cooled a little, with bran and shorts. Feed warm, and the hens thrive well on it. It has no tendency to make them fat, but being nitrogenous in nature it makes a valuable food for egg production.

The Massachusetts Agricultural Society has taken effective measures for the destruction of the gypsy moth. A number of men are appointed and each man is asked to take charge of a district about a mile square. Moth clusters and nests are collected and burned when found.

Many cocoons, nests, etc., of harmful insects can be destroyed by covering the garden or truck patch lightly with straw and then burning it, being careful to have all the weeds and stalks consumed.

THE TWO-FOLD GIFT
of the Holy Ghost,
BY REV. THOS. K. DOTY,
Author of Lessons in Holiness.

240 pp. Price postpaid.....65cts.

The design of this book is, in plain language, to designate the place of the Holy Ghost in both the Godhead and the work of Salvation. Especially to show that Entire Santification is wrought in the heart by the Baptism of Holy Ghost; and that the Epoch of the Baptism is identical with that of his Advent in his Indwelling Personalty. The agency of the Holy Ghost in the Life, and in carrying on the work of the Gospel, is given particular attention.

TITLES TO THE CHAPTERS:

1. A Summary. 2. The Holy Ghost a Person. 3. The New Testament Designating Terms. 4. The Scriptural View. 5. The Holy Ghost is God. 6. Blasphemy Against the Holy Ghost. 7. The Trinity of God. 8. The Apostolic Benediction. 9. The Worship of the Holy Ghost. 10. The Dispensations. 11. The First Dispensation. 12. The Second Dispensation. 13. Holiness—Sinning. 14. "The Sin of the World." 15. Final Deliverance from Sin. 16. The Day of the Holy Ghost. 17. Jesus and the Holy Ghost. 18 and 19. The Epoch of the Holy Ghost. 20. The Anointing. 21. The Baptism of the Holy Ghost. 22. The Baptism of Fire. 23. The Two-Fold Experiences of the Holy Ghost. 24. Fellowship of the Holy Ghost. 25. "In the Spirit." 26. Several Scriptural Terms Considered. 27. Pentecost. 28. Inspiration—Prophecy. 29. Spiritual Leading and Teaching. 30. The Gifts of the Spirit. 31. "Praying in the Holy Ghost." 31 and 32. Power.

This book is creating quite a stir in religious circles. The original, bold and convincing manner of presenting the subject, has forced the press to comment upon the book, either adversely or favorably, generally the latter. We give a few OPINIONS:

Bible Standard and Gospel Record: "This book is very compact, scarcely a superfluous sentence in the whole book. The manner of treating the questions involved is both clear and scriptural. .....The effect of the book will be to deepen thought and increase knowledge and, in the end, deepen piety."

Evangelical Messenger: "Brother Thomas K. Doty has written a book which we take pleasure in commending to all devout readers who enjoy all spiritual things. The subject is so important, and the treatment of it so timely, that we may be pardoned for calling attention to it thus prominently. We, at least have been greatly interested, and gratefully acknowledge that we have also been decidedly profited by persuing it .....Brother Doty writes with an incisive pen, in a clear, lucid style, often epigrammatical and with great force. He is evidently deeply impressed with the truth of what he writes and demands the respect even where he does not gain the intellectual assent of his readers. Withal the book is written in a kindly, candid spirit, rather didactic than polermical, and is calculated to help the reader and not to rouse his opposition, as is the case with so many books which have been written upon this and kindred subjects. The theological views expressed are orthodox, and in some cases the argument is fresh in matter, and certainly fresh in form throughout."

Christian Cynosure: "His book is one of the most excellent, instructive and practical of any that have come to our knowledge. The exposition of the Scriptures concerning the personality and work of the Spirit is very clear, able and comforting. There is much dogmatizing on these topics by Christians who never fully felt the power of the Spirit's work, or are not living in gracious fellowship with him. To all such and to those who have not yet learned what gifts the Lord is waiting to bestow on his people we heartily commend the careful reading of this volume."

"What's in a name?" Well, that depends. For instance, the name of "Ayer" is sufficient guarantee that Ayer's Sarsaparilla is a genuine, scientific blood-purifier, and not a sham, like so much that goes by the name of "sarsaparilla." Ayer's Sarsaparilla is the standard.

Rub In Rub Out is the way you wash clothes with soap. First you rub the soap in; that's work in itself. Then you rub it out again over the washboard. If your strong and rub hard enough, you may get the dirt out, too. It's hard work, and women know it. But it isn't the women only that suffer. She's wearing the clothes out, rubbing them to pieces, all the time. It's just as hard for every thing as it is for every body.

Soak In Soak Out is Pearline's way of washing. Put it in the water and it does its own work—yours, too. It brings the dirt out easily and quickly—no hard work, no wearing rub, rub, rub, no washboard. Doesn't that seem better? Saves strength and clothes. And, what some women can't believe, it's just as safe as any good soap. 377 JAMES PYLE, N. Y.

THE OBJECTS, WORK AND SECRET RITUAL of "The Nobles of the Mystic Shrine" have just been issued in a revised and enlarged edition. Price, in paper, 25 cents. This new order of Freemasonry, now so popular in this country as the basis of social hilarity among members of the higher degrees, claims to have originated in Arabia, and was revived in Egypt, and brought to America from France. It is interlarded with Mohammedan terms and worship; and its original objects as defined in its ritual, was inquisitorial and barbarous. Its prayers are addressed to "Allah," instead of the G. A. O. T. U., and it is quite as un-Christian as the devotees of the blue lodge would have it. The abridged edition is still sold for 15 cents. Address the National Christian Association, 221 West Madison street, Chicago.

There is a traitor in the Indianapolis branch of the American Protective Association, and the secrets of the order and its movements, it is alleged, are well known to the Catholics. The lodges are at a loss to know who has proved recreant to his obligation, and their strength has become weakness.

As a nation of inventors the United States leads the world, owing to the readiness, simplicity and cheapness of its patent system. The Commissioner of Patents, in his recent report to Congress, says the patents granted at Washington, up to Jan. 1, 1894, number 521,700, while those issued in all other countries combined aggregated only 817,362.

A serious muddle has arisen in the case of Eugene Prendergast, who murdered Mayor Harrison in this city last October. He was fairly tried, found guilty under undoubted evidence, and sentenced to be hanged last Friday. Another judge than the one who tried and sentenced him interfered and granted him a respite until April 6, and now the murderer is to be tried for insanity. The lawyers disagree widely upon the legal questions involved. By some it is claimed that the failure to hang him on the appointed day completely annuls the death sentence; while comparatively few believe that this accomplished villain has ever been insane. The management of his case has been defective in the extreme.

At Denver, Colo., last week, in the trial of Tim Drew and James Burns, charged with robbery, the attorney for the defense challenged a juror because he was a member of the A. P. A. The court overruled the challenge. The attorney then challenged the entire jury, and found that eleven of the twelve men empanneled were also members of the A. P. A. He asked for a new venire and that the coroner's office have charge of the jury, on the ground that the sheriff was prejudiced against the defendants because they are Catholics. One of the jurors when leaving the courtroom shouted: "Hurrah for the A. P. A.!" Now the religious belief of every juryman is investigated before he can find acceptance in this case, and every anti-Catholic is challenged. The complexion of that jury, when complete, will be a study.

The Women's Christian Temperance Union is to hold its coming national convention at Cleveland, Ohio, next fall. Immediately after its sessions shall have closed, Lady Henry Somerset and Miss Frances E. Willard, with an organized party of 100 appointees, under the supervision of Dr. Lunn, are to sail in a firstclass steamship to present the World's Temperance Petition to the rulers of as many existing governments as they may visit. This petition in behalf of universal temperance reform has over two million signatures. The movement is a laudable one, and may result in great benefit to a great many persons in all lands.

Californians claim, with considerable indignation, that the new treaty with China, now in process of perfection at Washington, virtually nullifies the present Chinese Exclusion law. In the meantime government inspectors have been urging the Chinese residents of California and other States to register, under the requirements of the law, with more or less success. Of the 72,472 in California 27,596 have registered, while in Colorado only 377 out of 1,398 in the State have complied with the law. In some localities the percentage is even less. New York shows a registry of but 915 in a total of 2,935. Numbers of the inspectors report a general willingness among the Chinese to register.

Hoffman's official Directory of the Roman Catholic Church in the United States, quite recently published, gives the total number of Catholics as 8,502,033. Unofficially the Catholics claim a population in this republic of 10,000,000. Statisticians say that it is very difficult to obtain accurate information regarding the actual number of Catholic communicants, as in their estimate they claim as adherents everyone in any way connected with their church. The number of adherents only is given. Of the total of 10,000,000, they claim that but 2,548,335 are adults. Probably Hoffman's figures are the most trustworthy. On the basis of the other estimates cited, there are only a little more than 2,000,000 adult Catholics in the United States.

In connection with the article on "The Situation in Europe," printed on another page, we find this significant paragraph in the New York Witness:

> When the Russo-German commercial treaty was first announced, we remarked that this change in the European situation would probably leave Great Britain without an ally in case of an aggressive movement on the part of either France or Russia, or of both combined, upon British interests in Egypt or in Asia. We find this opinion confirmed in an interesting letter from Vienna to the New York Sun. If future developments shall prove that the peace of continental Europe is to be cemented at the expense of Great Britain, the rulers of that empire may find it necessary to enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with China for mutual aid against Russia. And we think that if the time shall ever come when China's millions, armed with British ammunition and led by British officers, shall pour over the Russian border line, all the way from Vladivostock to the Pamir plateau, Russia will have reason to rue the day when she provoked such an invasion.

At Omaha, Neb., last week, in the criminal branch of the district court, a prisoner who was brought up to receive his sentence for fiercely assaulting a fellow-workmen, appealed to the judge (perhaps with the hope of his being an A. P. A.) for leniency, stating his own connection with that order. The trouble, he said, would never have taken place if he had kept out of the A. P. A. organization. He was an A. P. A. man, and the Catholics were down on him. Before he could proceed further he was interrupted by the court informing him that "if an A. P. A. or any other A." violated the law he would have to be punished. Even if he was an A. P. A. man, he did not have any right to knock out the brains of a Catholic. This settled the discussion, and the man silently listened to the words of the sentence, which provided for an incarceration of two years in the penitentiary.

Commenting on the outcome of the recent trial of Dan Coughlin for participation in the murder of Dr. Cronin, the editor of Farm, Field and Fireside pointedly observes: "The power of foreign oath-bound secret organizations like the Clan-na-Gael to influence the police, city officials and even the courts of an American city, is the fact which every patriotic citizen must acknowledge with shame for the past and apprehension for the future. So long as such organizations have such power our whole system of municipal government is a farce. Patriotism demands that we shall be relieved from the curse which is alike dangerous, whether it be Russian arnarchist, Irish Clan-na-Gael or Italian Mafia. As an indication of the power of such an organization to defeat the ends of justice the acquittal of Coughlin is a national calamity." These truths cannot be too often, or too strongly, presented to the people, or too earnestly accepted in the interest of national preservation.

ZEAL FOR CHRIST.

BY REV. J. M. FOSTER.

The word zeal means to boil. It is a combination of grief and anger, love and desire. The zealous man wishes to please and help his beloved, and is sad and indignant when an injury is done. But the object may be good or bad, a person or thing, and the zeal may be true or false. Jehu said: "Come, see my zeal for the Lord." But while he destroyed Baal, he still held the calves of Jeroboam. Paul bore record that the Jews had a zeal for God, but not according to knowledge. On the other hand, Phinehas was zealous for his God and made an atonement for the children of Israel. When Christ had driven out of the temple the sheep and the oxen, and overthrown the tables of the money-changers, and required those who sold doves to take them hence, the disciples remembered that it was written, "the zeal of thine house hath consumed me." While it is true that a man cannot have a holy zeal for a wicked cause, he may have an unholy zeal for a good cause. The Jews were zealous for the law, but they were hypocrites. This unholy zeal was active and led them to make great sacrifices to accomplish their ends. How, then, are we to distinguish the true and false?

I. They differ in their sources. The one originates in the selfish human heart. It is the product of self-interest. It is earthly, sensual, devilish. The other is produced by the Holy Spirit in the renewed heart. It is the unction from the Holy One. It is Christ formed in the heart.

False zeal is party spirit. Republicans and Democrats have it. Each defames and maligns the other. One-tenth of the votes in every national election are purchasable. Both parties bid for these, and defend their course. Utah is knocking at our gates for admission to Statehood. Both parties are ready to admit her, because they expect to get votes by it. Both parties are willing to legalize the liquor traffic, instead of destroying it, because they want the liquor vote. The Jews, the Romanists, the Ritualists, have this selfish party spirit. Many in the Reformed churches have it also.

True zeal is inspired by love for Christ and devotion to his bride, the church. To Christ he says: "Thine are we, David, and on thy side, thou son of Jesse." "For me to live is Christ." Of the church he says: "Therefore I wish that peace may still within thy walls remain, and ever may thy palaces prosperity retain." "All my well-springs are in thee."

False zeal springs from error. The Brahmins, the Buddhists, the Mohammedans, are zealous for their lustful superstitions, because their foolish minds are darkened by error. The Masons, Odd-fellows, Knights of Pythias, zealously defend their orders, because they are judicially blinded. But true zeal arises from the apprehension of the unspeakable value, dignity and importance of the truth as it is in Jesus. "The truth shall make you free." "The words that I speak unto you, they are spirit and they are life." The one is like mettle in a blind horse. The second see clearly and walk in the light.

II. They differ in their manifestation. False zeal is malignant, but the true is benevolent. Before his conversion Paul persecuted the church. After the Spirit revealed Christ to him he said: "Woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel." "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels; though I have all faith, so that I could remove mountains; and though I give my body to be burned, and have not charity, it profiteth me nothing." False zeal is proud, vindictive and self-asserting, while the true is meek and lowly. Before Christ suffered Peter impudently rebuked his Lord, and boasted that he would die with him, and used his sword to defend him. But this zeal quickly subsided when a girl charged him with being a disciple. After the Spirit was given, he stood before the Jewish Sanhedrim and said: "We ought to obey God rather than man." One was the expression of his own proud heart; the other, of a renewed heart. When a heathen and the missionary were disputing, a witness said: "I could tell that the heathen was wrong and the Christian right, because the first lost his temper and spoke angrily, while the second was calm and confident." This explains why a Mason so quickly loses his self-control when arguing with an anti-secret-society man. False zeal is irreverent, while the true is reverent. "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom." When this is wanting, the zeal is spurious. False zeal does not make holy, while the true purifies. The Pharisees, the Inquisitors-General, and the persecuting prelates were often unholy and even immoral, while professing to be zealots for God and the church. But the missionaries, the reformers and the champions for truth and righteousness are pure and holy.

III. True zeal is rooted and grounded in the ineradicable convictions of the believing soul. The Y. P. S. C. E. has grown in thirteen years from forty-eight members to 1,800,000. They are full of enthusiasm, because they stand for the glory of God, for the honor of the Redeemer, for the salvation of men, and for the enlargement and establishment of Christ's kingdom. The lukewarm never tunnel mountains, bridge rivers, span continents with railroads and oceans with telegraphs. The men of invincible enthusiasm do the great work. Hence Christ said: "I would that you were cold or hot: So, then, because you are lukewarm, I will spew thee out of my mouth." While on earth, Christ discovered "the zeal of the Lord of hosts." And Paul says: "Let the same mind be in you that was in Christ Jesus." Children are zealous for their father. God says: "I will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters." Subjects are zealous for their sovereign. "If I be a king, where is mine honor?" Captives are zealous for their Redeemer. Ye are not your own; ye are bought with a price." "Redeemed, not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with the precious blood of Christ." Soldiers are zealous for their leader. We are to be good soldiers of the cross of Christ, following the Captain of our salvation. We are stewards of the household of God; and pure and undefiled religion consists in visiting the fatherless and widows in their affliction; that we carry the Gospel to those who are without the Father and who are helpless and hopeless. This is the believer's consuming zeal. It is the zeal that is according to knowledge.

IV. True zeal should be cultivated. This is done: 1. By avoiding all cant, all shamming. Nothing so quickly and effectually paralyzes our inner being as to feign or express what we do not feel. It means spiritual death. 2. Live near to God. The presence of certain men is an inspiration to us. We are uplifted by them. The presence of God is the power of an endless life. To be enthusiastic we must keep in touch with him. We must be overshadowed by the Holy Spirit. We must walk with Jesus, and our hearts will burn within us as he talks by the way and opens unto us the Scriptures. "Abide in me, and let me abide in you." 3. Keep the truth constantly before the mind. William Carey became an enthusiast on missions by reading and meditating upon the works of the missionaries. We become zealous for Christ by keeping before our minds the unspeakable excellence of Christ and the infinite value of his work for us. 4. Be filled with the Spirit. Avoid grieving him. Seek to woo him to your heart. Quench not the Spirit, but yield to his strivings. "It is not by might nor by power, but by my Spirit, saith the Lord."

BIBLE DISTRIBUTION IN MEXICO.

The American Bible Society turned its attention to Mexico in 1826. Mr. J. C. Brigham says that among 7,000,000 people not more than 2,000 Bibles and Testaments could be found. In 1829, in Chihuahua (population 12,100) not over eight Bibles in Spanish could be found. In 1834, Mr. Sumner Bakon was agent to Texas. In 1848, Rev. W. H. Morris was sent to the City of Mexico. Miss Malinda Rankins labored on the border from 1852 and onward, which led to the introduction of many Bibles into Mexico.

Dr. Arthur Gore was the first resident agent in the City of Mexico, which was in 1878; and after him came Rev. H. P. Hamilton, in 1879. During Rev. Mr. Hamilton's time, there have been put into the hands of the Mexicans, 130,000 volumes of the Scriptures.

It is estimated that since 1861 no less than 370,000 Bibles, Testaments and portions of the Scriptures (including those sent directly from London and Madrid) have found their way into the hands of the people.

In April, 1890, B. B. Blachly entered the work as a colporteur at the City of Chihuahua, not knowing the Spanish language; but God saw fit to bless his efforts from the start. In 1890, there was one man who sold nearly twice as many books as he did; but in 1891 Mr. Blachly sold 383 Bibles, 546 Testaments and 371 portions of Scripture, or 96 copies more than any of the other thirty colporteurs, and received for the same $321.69.

From this fact we conclude that the Bible is its own advertiser; for Mr. Blachly did not understand Spanish but a little; while for the others, Spanish was their own language. When Christ gave the last commission to his disciples, he said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the Gospel, and lo, I am with you alway." The Gospel was what they were to preach. Mr. Blachly relates an account of his work and travels during the first three years of labor in Mexico, as follows:

After canvassing the City of Chihuahua, I went to the town of Sierra Mohada, State of Coanhuila, where the people were anxious for the Bible. Nearly everybody who could read bought a copy of the Scriptures, and a day or two after the sale of Bibles and Testaments, when walking along the streets, one would see men, women and childen reading from the Book or listening to some one else. One man liked it so well that, although poor, he bought a Catholic Bible, in four volumes, for $12, to prove to his old father that it was about the same as the Protestant Bible. It would make the hearts of all lovers of the Scriptures beat with joy to see how hungry the people are for the bread of life. It reminds one of the hungry fish catching at a bait. But oh, how vile the people are; and so ignorant!

While passing along the street one day, I saw a nude man, and a woman was looking in his hair for vermin; and this on the public street. At this town there was a large silver mine owned by an American company.

From here I went back to Chihuahua and started for the Sierra Madre Mountains, to a town called Batopilas, a small mining camp (where Boss Shepherd was—the ex-governor of the District of Columbia), which is down in a deep canon, where I first saw the orange tree with fruit, while on the mountain summit was ice and snow. From the San Miguel mine there has been a great deal of native silver mined. At this place there was not a single chapter of God's Word in Spanish to be seen, much less a Bible, and people would ask the questions: "Where does the Bible come from?" "Who made it?" "Did you make it?" The sales were perfectly marvelous; everybody wanted a copy. One woman who could not see very well, wanted an 8vo. Bible (the only one left), and promised to pay for it in the morning. So in the morning she paid, as agreed, the $4.50, saying: "I had to deny myself of much to get the money;" but oh how rejoiced she was to own the Book! A Mexican was hired to carry a box of books, weighing 65 pounds, and in two successive days sold $50 worth per day in the streets. One woman, on her way to the meat market, stopped and looked at a Bible and said: "I was on my way to the market for meat, but I want this Book, and as I have not enough money to buy both, I will take the Book." So she bought it and went back without her meat.

Another woman bought three Bibles, saying: "I want one apiece for my three daughters;" and afterwards, when passing her store, the three daughters were seen reading from their Bibles. Stopping at a hovel, a poor woman looked at the Bible, read some, and said: "So nice; won't you please sit down and wait while I see if I can borrow money to pay for it?" After waiting awhile she returned with the money, and her joy was great in possessing a Bible of her own. Doctors, lawyers, miners, woodmen, merchants, washwomen, and peddlers, all bought the Word of God—all except the priest, who would not even touch it with his finger.

Leaving Batopilas, and while crossing another high range of mountains with a Mexican pack-train, I sold a few Testaments. After five days of hard climbing up and down, I reached the town of El Fuerta, where good success was met with. This town is on the El Fuerta river, in the heart of a rich farming country. Here I was met by an old woman, who showed me her court (an inner yard), saying: "I used to have a Bible, but the priest took it, and two or three others, and burned them." After looking at a large Bible, she bought it, saying: "I will not let the priest have this one, but will keep it to read."

In this town lived a family of father, mother and three daughters. While the mother and three daughters were examining the Bible, the father asked me if I did not want to buy a girl for a night, or while staying in the town. My reply was: "You are a brute—worse than a burro; you have no respect for yourself, much less for your daughters. I am not buying girls, but selling the Bible." It is a shameful fact that fathers and mothers do sell their daughters for immoral purposes, and then receive them back again into their families. A prostitute mingles with the families of the upper class, providing she is good-looking and well-dressed. A harlot is not looked down upon as in other civilized nations. She is in accord with the religion of the Church of Rome. There was an Indian tailor, who was a smart man. He could read and write, and was posted on many things, but he would not get a Bible, notwithstanding he had been urged for some time. So, as a last argument, I said to him, "You are well-informed on some questions, but on the Bible you are a great big fool. Why not get a Bible and become civilized?" This was too much to resist; he bought a Bible at once.

ABOUT LODGE "CHARITY."

Begun, as the ancient fraternities were, under pagan influence and so-called heathen institutions, before the refining influences of our Christian religion infused into them the more active spirit of brotherly charity, they must, of necessity, have been but crude and circumscribed in their operations and spheres of usefulness. But as time advanced their influence and benevolent results so developed and multiplied that to-day they are known and felt in nearly every community and hamlet throughout the civilized world.—Royal Arcanum.

Resolved, That the support of the widows and education and maintenance of the orphans of deceased Odd-fellows who are in good standing is not "charity," but legal obligation that devolves upon State grand lodges and encampments, and in the discharge of this sacred duty such grand bodies have the legal right and full power to make reasonable and necessary assessments upon its subordinates to provide and maintain homes for such dependents.—Adopted by the Grand Lodge of Texas.

EXPERIENCE WITH THE A. P. A.

EDITOR WESLEYAN METHODIST:—I would kindly ask for a small space to make a few plain statements, with regard to the order of the A. P. A., or the American Protective Association, as it is called. They have a lodge here in the city of Sterling Ill., claiming a membership of over two hundred, or at least they say so; and of course the members of secret, oath-bound societies would not tell anything that was not true; it would be contrary to their religion. I wish here to give a note of warning by giving you a little of my experience. Some of the members of the order, one a member of the Methodist Episcopal church, and one that is profane and ungodly, used all their influence to get me to join the A. P. A., telling me what a grand thing it was, and that there was no harm in it; and as I am not able to work, that if I would join them they would help me to some office, as they had all the power in their own hands, and like the devil tempting Christ, promised him all the kingdoms of this world if he would fall down and worship him. They did not promise me the kingdoms of this world, but that they would receive me into the order free. They also told me there was nothing in the A. P. A. that would interfere with the Christian religion; and also that if its members lived up to the rules of the order it was as good as the church; and should there be anything that I was not satisfied with I could leave at any time; and that when I was being taken into the order if I wished to stop I could do so and go no farther. I finally agreed to let them present my name as an applicant for admission to the society, but did not feel satisfied. I passed, and was notified that they were ready to receive me as a member, and that the only object of the society was to save our country from the power of the Catholics. I hesitated. For nearly a month they were after me, and the devil told me that I might be the means of doing good; but conscience said, no. At last I yielded to the temptation in an unguarded moment, and went with the member that recommended me. They met in the G. A. R. hall, in a room in the third story of the building. It was beautifully decorated with pictures and battle scenes. I did not feel quite at ease; and what was my surprise when instead of being asked a few plain questions and to sign a paper or contract to stand up for our rights as American citizens, and wage war if necessary against the Roman forces, the first question I was asked, or rather to fill out a blank which asked how old I was, and how long I had been a Protestant, and sign my name to it. The paper was then taken into the room were the officers were; then there was an oath presented to me or read, to which I had to answer, Yes, that I would carry out all the requirements in the oath. Then came the hoodwinking, and they led me into the other room where I was taken up to a table—I could not tell who was there for I was blindfolded; then there was a lot of nonsense, such as is carried on in the Masonic lodge—Who have you got there? etc.; then another oath was administered to which I merely gave assent, feeling guilty and condemned and ashamed to think that I had been caught and hoodwinked by a secret, oath-bound society. The question was asked: "Will you, or do you want to proceed further?" I said: "No." They said to me again: "Do you understand?" I answered: "Yes." I was then led back to the first room, and the hoodwink removed. Several persons followed me and asked what was the matter. I told them I could not go any farther, and could not be a member of a secret society; and while they had hoodwinked me, they did not get the rope around my neck, although they had examined my neck, to see if it was all right. I asked them if they were going to hang me, to which they made no reply. I left the room, glad in God I had escaped, but ashamed to think I had been caught. But, thank God, I escaped the snare of the devil. God helping I will never be caught again. Think for a moment of members of an oath-bound secret society claiming that it was through the meeting of the members of the A. P. A. that there has been such a wonderful display of God's power in the salvation of nearly three hundred souls in our city, and the small city of Rock Falls! God has wonderfully manifested his saving power in the different churches. Then think of a secret oath-bound society claiming to have caused or been the cause in bringing about such a wonderful work! Think of the membership composed of ministers, church members, blasphemers, Sabbath-breakers, drunkards, all brethren of this wonderful society! I want to say in conclusion, it is a child of Masonry from beginning to end. I would say to all professing Christians, avoid it as you would a deadly viper. I have said what I have to put members of the Wesleyan church and all others on their guard. God save us from the snare of the devil.—J. B. Elsrod, in the Wesleyan Methodist.

THE SITUATION IN EUROPE.

The North American Review for March contains an interesting article from Archibald Forbes, on the "Outlook for War in Europe." He confines himself to a consideration of the subject in two divisions; first, whether the present extensive military preparations must inevitably result in a great war; and, second, when the outbreak of the tremendous conflict may be looked for.

The enormous expenditure for military preparation, to one who looks at the burden of taxation, is referred to as satisfactory evidence to many that an early war is inevitable; but he argues that, however burdensome as is the armed existing peace, resort to war would, in the nature of things, be infinitely more costly. He suggests that even the expenses of war would be readily borne if, by such means, a permanent reduction in military expenditures could be obtained, but experience has demonstrated that modern wars have been invariably followed by increased armaments. He reasons, because of the "Triple Alliance" and the "Dual Alliance" which have been formed in Europe, that there are no longer five powers whose action is liable to precipitate a general war, but only two great powers. That the five great powers no longer possess the independent, individual freedom to declare war, and that the initiative must be taken either by the Dual Alliance, consisting of France and Russia, or by the Triple Alliance, consisting of Germany, Austria, and Italy.

The end of the year 1895 is as far in the future as his intimate acquaintance with the situation in Europe leads him to postpone the clash of arms. Germany, the leading power of the Triple Alliance, is stronger to-day than ever before, by the addition of the 70,000 men which the Army Act of last October sanctioned, and with a large amount of treasure in reserve as a war fund, is ready for war on short notice. Austria, while not as fully equipped for war as Germany, is supplied with all modern appliances, and is in a position to furnish a formidable army with but little delay. Italy is referred to as not being in the highest condition of efficiency, and would be a very uncertain factor in the event of hostilities.

Of the Dual Alliance France is said to be at the very apex of her military strength and preparedness. By the system of drilling which has been in operation since 1889, every man fit for service and of proper age has received military training. As the population of France is no longer increasing, she cannot add to the numbers of available men, but her naval armament is constantly being augmented by the adoption of the latest and most approved devices of marine warfare. Russia for many years has been gradually concentrating her regular army on the western frontier, thereby not only protecting the weakest and most exposed portion of her territory, but also increasing the facility of mobilization in case any difficulty should arise with her neighbors. At the first outbreak of war the reserves would be called for from the interior, and this, owing to the distance and the lack of proper railroad facilities, would necessitate a delay of two or three months, during which time the Russian army on the frontier would no doubt confine itself to the defensive. As to finances, Russia seems to be in a fairly prosperous condition. Her Minister of Finance has just announced that the treasury has funds on hand to meet "any considerable disbursements during the year, and that there is not the slightest necessity for incurring a fresh loan." She has accumulated a fund of $20,000,000 in gold to meet the expenses of her army operating on foreign soil where her paper would not be received. The only obstacle which Russia would have to meet in the event of an early conflict would be that of securing, on short notice, modern implements of warfare. Because of the lack of proper arms, and which could not by any possibility be provided earlier than the spring of 1896, an outbreak before that time is hardly thought to be probable.

The total number of field troops available which could be brought into action in case of war, is estimated at 10,413,905. This large number of men is almost equally divided between the Dual and the Triple Alliance.

The general situation is summed up as strange, lurid, and in a sense humiliating. Armed Europe waits for the ultimate mandate of one man, and whether it shall be peace or war is the problem which Tsar Alexander III., alone and single handed, is to determine. One thing only is certain, that, when the conflict comes it will be a struggle to the death, and the vanquished nations must reckon on suffering dismemberment.—E. E. Parlin, in the Signs of the Times.

RELICS OF EGYPT AND CHALDEA.

Mr. Flinders Petrie finds undoubted evidence from the excavations in Egypt, that the stonecutters of four thousand years ago used both solid and tubular drills, circular as well as straight saws, and other tools which we have considered as solely of modern manufacture. Drills, exactly similar to those used at the present time, were set with jewels, and even lathe tools had cutting edges.

In Scribner's A. L. Lewis discusses "The Place of the Exodus in the History of Egypt," and critically compares the Hebrew chronology of the Old Testament with the evidence deduced from the deciphered papyri and monuments of Egypt. The generally accepted theory that Rameses II was the Pharoah of the oppression and that his son and successor, Menepthah, was the Pharoah of the exodus, is rejected as fallacious. Important evidence is adduced that the exodus occurred at an earlier date, soon after the founding of the nineteenth dynasty by Rameses I, the foster-mother of the infant Moses probably being Meri Aten, daughter of the King Khuenaten, whose capital and tomb at Tel-el-Amarner was recently explored by Dr. Flinders Petrie.

"Egypt and Chaldea in the Light of Recent Discoveries" is the title of W. St. Chad Boscawen's illustrated paper in Harper's. In it is described and pictured many of the results of the recent explorations of the mounds of Telleh, the excavation of the palaces of Gudea (cir. 3000 B. C.) and his forerunner Urbahu (cir. 3800 B. C.), and the uncovering of the pyramid of Medum, its surrounding necropolis, and, at its foot, possibly the oldest temple of the world. These wonderful discoveries shed a flood of light upon a traditionary period of the world, but which they also prove to be a period rich in the arts of civilization and far indeed from the infancy of the human race.

THE WISE MEN OF GOTHAM.

As King John was passing through the village of Gotham, on his way to Nottingham, he proposed to make a short cut across the meadows. The villagers, thinking that whatever road a king took thenceforward became a public road, objected, much to John's annoyance.

Shortly afterward he sent some messengers from his court to learn the cause of the villagers' rudeness. Hearing of the coming of the king's servants, the villagers hit upon the following plan of turning aside the monarch's wrath:

When the messengers arrived, they found some of the inhabitants engaged in trying to drown an eel in a pond; others were busy rolling cheeses down a hill, so that they might run to Nottingham for sale, while a third set were employed in placing a hedge round a bush on which a cuckoo had perched, in order that they might enjoy perpetual spring.

The king's servants thought they had come among a village of fools, and, having reported what they had seen, John formed the same opinion, and troubled himself no more about what he considered their incivility to him. Hence the people have talked about the "wise men," or "the fools," of Gotham.

There was much wisdom in their folly, however. There is to-day, so it is said, a bush growing on the site of the one whereon the cuckoo perched.

NEW ENGLAND LETTER.

A memorable spring.—Legislative matters.—A miltary instructor for Harvard.—"The church and workingmen."

Two things will make memorable to Massachusetts people the spring of 1894:—the phenomenal mildness with which it has opened, as if March was masquerading in the borrowed plumes of April, and the omission, for the first time in people's memories, of the customary Fast-day proclamation. It is a strange coincidence that the vote to abolish this old landmark of Puritan time was passed on February 15, the very month and day on which the first Fast was appointed, in 1630. It has stood 264 years; and now, with haste and zeal worthy of a better cause, has been assigned to the lumber-room of the past. To us who loved the day, who were proud of it as an heirloom left to us by our forefathers, and regret its abolition, the 19th of April can never take its place. That is like the old mahogany and silver which give to their possessors such a pleasant, stable sense of family respectability. This new holiday is a veneered, plated thing, and altogether parvenu.

Our legislators have not yet been obliged, like those of New York, to introduce a bill to prohibit the flying of foreign flags on her public buildings. It is true that we have a small Tammany tiger of our own, but the patriotic efforts of the independent women-voters have so far kept him from developing into anything of the size or ferocity that New York City boasts. It is true that on St. Patrick's day one enthusiastic Hibernian, who drove one of the United States mail-wagons of the Boston post-office, decorated his vehicle with green flags, but they were promptly ordered to be taken off by the postmaster.

The passing of the Woman-Suffrage bill by the House has been the notable event of the week. The names of the men who voted "Yea" on this question are almost without exception such as were borne by the old settlers who made a strip of sterile soil, bathed in the storms and fogs of the Atlantic, the heart and brain of the country —New England. But the men who voted "No" were the Sweeneys, the O'Briens, the Donovans, the Murphys, the Rosnoskys. And they are the ones who presume to lay down the law for intelligent American women, as if they were not at least as capable as these men of alien birth and alien religion of judging about the womanly "sphere" and womanly duties. The disgraceful condition of Boston's pauper institutions, lately brought to public attention through the efforts of Mrs. Alice Lincoln and others; the utter lack of ordinary decency and common comforts; the herding of the unfortunate poor with criminals, and the general mismanagement, is a painful proof that Uncle Sam needs some women-housekeepers, and the sooner the better.

The Legislature has done a good thing in deciding adversely on the bill which provides that the different beneficiary orders may grant inducements to members, either of money or prizes, to bring in new members. This, as a representative of the Knights of Honor said, speaking for that body, would revive "the flagging interest in the beneficial orders," and cause them to receive "a great impetus;" but he did not add that the pockets of the hard-working poor would be correspondingly depleted. It is surprising, but in spite of the hard experience of the multitudes gulled by these orders, these paid agents would found another crop of fools all ready to fleece, had the bill passed.

In Vermont and New Hampshire the good work of shutting up the dram-shops goes triumphantly on. I see the name of R. A. Frobock, of Alton, President of the New Hampshire Christian Associaton, mentioned among the prominent workers. A paragraph in one of our dailies states that "the anti-rum committee of 100 in New Hampshire continues its raids, but the saloon-keepers now get word of the raiding in advance." Their lodge-oath is very convenient in such cases, especially the clause to warn every brother of approaching danger. In the county court at Montpelier, Vt. a hotel-keeper has just been sentenced to sixty days in the house of correction. He was doing a good business but in his haste to grow rich faster than he could legitimately he violated the liquor law, but escaped arrest by leaving town. His hotel was closed, sold at a sacrifice, and his family reduced to poverty, while he, returning to Montpelier in disguise, was captured and put behind prison bars. Verily prohibition in Vermont, if it does not always prohibit, makes the way of the transgressor very hard and thorny.

Harvard has done one bad thing and one good one. For the two hundred and fifty-odd years of its history it has got along very well without a professor of military science and tactics. Now, for the first time an army officer has been detailed to Cambridge to instruct the students in the glorious art of war. This is not progression, but retrogression. Between baseball and the military instructor, what time will a Harvard student have left for such trifles as Greek and the higher mathematics? The good thing is the resurrecting and enforcing of an old law which forbids indulgence in punches and distilled liquors on Class day and Commencement. This measure has President Eliot's endorsement, in spite of the fact that he is a moderate drinker himself, and "sees no harm in it."

"The Church and Workingmen" was the subject of an informal discussion at a recent Ministers' Meeting at Hartford, Conn. The chaplain of the State's prison, Rev. E. F. Atwood, believed that trades-unions interfered with the workingmen, beause of their favor towards foreign labor, and said that the lodge attracted twelve where the church does one, because the latter fails to show a like fraternal spirit. But did the Rev. Mr. Atwood ever know of cases of misfortune and distress where the sufferers stood outside the pale both of the lodge and the church, in which the former did not stand modestly aside and allow the latter to do all the helping? Any person experienced in charitable work can certify that in times of distrees like the present it is the church people, not the lodgemen, who answer appeals for aid. I do not doubt Mr. Atwood's statements that there are but three Odd-fellows and two Masons in the State's prison. Perhaps the only wonder is that there are any at all, considering how successful these orders are in shielding their derelict members; but his further statement that "more than half the inmates have been members of a Christian church," I can only understand on the supposition that he includes those who are members of the Romish church. Rome, we know, supplies a large percentage of our criminal classes, and also that if they have once been baptized and confirmed, such a record does not cut them off from her communion. Surely the chaplain of Connecticut's State's prison does not mean to say that more than half the inmates have been members of a Protestant church! Yet this is what a careless reader might infer. However, the moral remains the same. We do not need to turn our churches into beneficiary institutions, so that the thriftless and improvident will be tempted to join them for the loaves and fishes; but they do need a Pentecostal baptism which shall lead them to look after both the souls and bodies of men, and burn up the worldly dross that too often converts its "fine gold" into "sounding brass."

ELIZABETH E. FLAGG.

OUR WASHINGTON LETTER.

WASHINGTON, March 21, 1894.

This has been temperance week in Washington. The first gun, if such an expression be permissible in this connection, was fired Sunday afternoon at the first of a series of special meetings under the auspices of the W. C. T. U., which are to be continued for two weeks. The principal speaker at the first meeting was the Indiana orator, Mr. Luther Benson, whose picturesque flow of language never fails to hold the attention of an audience. Here is a short extract from his address: "Paint a picture, and start by depicting on it everything that is horrid, revolting and disgusting. Then place on it a deserted home, with a mother and her innocent children suffering the pangs of hunger and clothed in rags. Paint on it trees whose fruit is poison. Put on it scenes of the most shameless degradation. Trim it with bleeding hearts, and then turn on it all the horrors of hell itself, and you will not have one tithe of the truth about intemperance. Man's tongue and ingenuity could not conceive a lie evil enough, distorted enough, to approach the evils of intemperance. It is the evil of evils and the crime of crimes. How this grand republic of ours would grow and glow but for the rum cancer which is destroying thousands of bright young lives annually. Could we but stop the traffic, it would depopulate our penitentiaries, jails, calabooses, and alms-houses, and the bright sunlight would be streaming through their open doors. Instead of locking up a man with whisky in him, let us lock up the whisky before it gets into the poor man."

Sunday evening the oldest temperance organization in Washington, and some say in the United States—the Congressional Temperance Society—held its sixtieth annual meeting, it having been postponed from February 25, the proper date, in honor of the ninetieth birthday of Gen. Neal Dow, and being held two days in advance of that event in order that it should not conflict with the popular celebration which had been arranged by the W. C. T. U. for the 20th inst. The annual report of the secretary, Rev. F. D. Power, did not show that the society was doing much more than setting a good example; it has never been as numerous or as useful as the friends of temperance would like it to be. The report criticised the use of wine at state dinners and praised Mrs. Cleveland for never drinking it; also Mrs. Carlisle, for having presided over a Cabinet dinner at which no wine was served. The portion of the report, however, which should be most carefully studied is embraced in the following extract therefrom: "Once in thirty years the people of the United States drink the full value of all their property. Three millions of wage-earners walk the streets empty-handed, while one thousand million of dollars of the people's money goes yearly to satisfy the rum king. Lately a procession of 18,000 men walked the streets of Chicago, bearing a banner with the inscription: 'Our children cry for bread.' Then they went to a grove, settled down, and drank 1,400 kegs of beer. Silver agitates the people from sea to sea, though the entire coined money is less than $500,000,000. Tax tariff is a problem, though it amounts to less than $300,000,000; the great pension question amounts to less than $150,000,000, but the nation's liquor bill is $1,000,000,000."

The Neal Dow anniversary meeting, which was held last night in Convention Hall, was a great success from every point of view, with a large audience, good speaking by prominent orators and grand singing by the same choir which was such an enjoyable feature of the Moody and Sankey meetings. It would have warmed the heart of the "grand old man" of prohibition could he have been present and heard the spontaneous enthusiasm with which thousands of Washington's best people assembled in his honor greeted each and every one of the numerous references to him by the various speakers. It was a meeting long to be remembered by all who attended it, and it will doubtless have a good effect upon the other temperance meetings to be held under the same auspices during this and next week.

Congress has been assured, in an official communication from the President, that there is no occasion for anxiety on account of complications likely to follow the landing of British marines at Bluefields, on the Mosquito Coast of Nicaragua, the British government having stated that the commander of its vessel only did what the commander of an American vessel would have done under the same circumstances—landed marines for the preservation of life and property during a local disturbance.

The Bland coinage bill was considered at the Cabinet meeting yesterday, and will, it is expected, be taken up again at Friday's meeting. The President has until the 29th inst. to decide whether he will sign it, veto it, or allow it to become a law without his signature.

The revised tariff bill has been reported to the Senate, and notice formally given that it will be called up April 2. Its ultimate fate is still in doubt, as several of the majority Senators are opposed to some of its provisions—notably the income tax.

THURLOW WEED: "I now look back through an interval of fifty-six years with a conscious sense of having been governed through the Anti-masonic excitement by a sincere desire, first to vindicate the violated laws of my country, and next to arrest the great power and dangerous influences of secret societies."

Reform News.

THE EASTERN AGENT IN PENNSYLVANIA.

Home Hotel, Pittsburgh, Pa., March 22, 1894.

Dear Cynosure:—I am led to rejoice each day because of God's goodness to me. The papers report 50,000 men in and about Pittsburgh out of employment. I have all I can do. In these tumultuous times, when there is so much corruption, and consequent unrest everywhere, how comforting to the Christian is the knowledge that even the wrath of man shall be made to praise Him who holds the scepter in his right hand. No set of men can run the affairs of our government aright without divine wisdom and guidance. The sooner we, as a nation, realize this, the happier shall we be.

My work for two weeks past has been largely among the United and Reformed Presbyterians. This has not been because I felt that there was greater danger of their uniting with the lodge than others, but to stir them up to greater activity in their opposition, and to aid them in the maintenance of the position they have so loyally taken. "Eternal vigilance" is said to be the "price of liberty." Believing that every pulpit should be a "watch tower" from which the people should be warned of the danger at hand, I wish to help those who are willing to "Cry aloud and spare not."

Thank God there are yet many prophets that are obeying this injunction—true ministers of Christ who are willing to be sacrificed that he may be exalted.

A canvass of the friends in this field shows our cause to be steadily gaining in the affection of the people. Notwithstanding the depression in finances, but few discontinue their subscriptions to the Cynosure, and many new names are added. Cash and pledges to the State work indicate a confidence and approval pleasant to note.

Last Sabbath I was invited to preach in the United Presbyterian church at Midway, Pa. Many expressed a desire to hear me on the lodge question, in the near future. Five contributed $5 each in aid of the work, and others subscribed for the Cynosure. Oil and gas contribute much to the farmers' means in this section. Those who are Christians, of course, are giving as the Lord has prospered them. Are there not others in this State, who shall read these lines, who will feel it a privilege to aid in the home work? If so, send your contribution or pledge to Edwin P. Sellew, the State Treasurer, 207 Walnut Place, Philadelphia, Pa. All contributions received will be duly acknowledged and used according to the direction of the State Executive Committee in the furtherance of the work. Five hundred dollars judiciously expended would greatly advance the work now. Can you help?

On Tuesday it was my privilege to listen to trial-sermons preached by the young men soon to go forth to their life-work from the R. P. Theological Seminary. All gave evidence of thorough study. They will be "workmen that need not be ashamed." Dr. Wilson reports seminary work in a flourishing condition.

Next Sabbath I respond to the most cordial invitation of Rev. E. R. Tilton, pastor of the Baptist church, Library, Pa., to preach and lecture to his people. I had previously thought to go to Chambersburg, Pa.

Sabbath, April 1, I shall (D. V.) be with Bro. Myers, pastor of the German Baptist church, at Oaks, a little north of Philadelphia; and from the 5th to the 10th with our good friend, Rev. A. S. Shelly, Bally, Berks county, Pa.

The last of April I hope to spend in New York City. For Christ and reform. W. B. Stoddard.

FROM THE PACIFIC COAST AGENT.

Philomath, Ore., March 16, 1894.

On Thursday evening, the 8th, I spoke in Albany, the county seat of Linn county, Oregon, in the M. E. church, South; text, Rev. 1: 8. We tried to show that Christ is All in the "physical universe," "central theme of the Bible," "the one subject of the Christian ministry," "everything in redemption," and "all of heaven." "If we could live a thousand years, and preach three sermons a day, there would be enough in Christ to take up all our time and energies."

We have so far failed to secure a house in which to speak out directly against the lodge in this city, and so we have to "edge in" all we can on the line of reform. In fact, I think sometimes about as much real good can be accomplished by

Correspondence.

FROM THE NEW ENGLAND SECRETARY.

Boston, Mass., March 17, 1894.

Editor Cynosure:—What's the matter with "anti-secret society men" in Iowa? An article before me would indicate either a demented or rabid condition. The writer states that "they recently held a convention in a somewhat obscure town," and there "ranted and raved to their hearts' content." He brands the whole company as "fanatics," who spent the time "repeating threadbare and false statements, gray with age, and in idle vaporings." They indulged in such malevolent and vindictive language as to provoke the Iowa Odd-fellow to say editorially: "They reminded us of the days when they flayed alive, burned at the stake, hung, drew and quartered people belonging to a sect or denomination who did not agree with themselves. Their utterances breathe the same spirit as existed in the hearts of those who crucified Christ. They would resurrect the horrors of the Inquisition, and the thumb-screw and rack, and would wring from us our horrid secrets." As I scanned the list of epithets and began to comprehend the situation, I realized that this is "a world of change." That men whose intelligent faces and brotherly kindness I recalled had fallen from grace, and entered the service of the "great red dragon" of intolerance, and were actually thirsting for "gore," is awful apostacy. Bros. Trumbull, Robb, Dorcas, Laird and their allies transformed into moonshiners and thugs is appalling. Then the sublime charity of the editor appears, when, after berating them in the most hostile terms, he considerately adds: "These good people are deserving of our pity;" and to further palliate their conduct and excuse their stupidity, he says: "Only dense ignorance and superstition breed fanaticism, and these good people are the most ignorant of fanatics." It may be some comfort to the "Antis" in Iowa to know where they belong. They have been weighed editorially in the Odd-fellows' scales, and labeled "the most ignorant fanatics."

The astute editor, fearing possibly that his statement would not be deemed sufficient to sustain so grave a charge, furnishes the proof. Here it is: "They prate about something of which they know absolutely nothing." I was about to say, Brethren, you ought to "quit your meanness," when my eye caught the next sentence, "For if they knew, they would be ever dumb from very shame." This put me into a dilemma. This erudite Odd-fellow deliberately writes and publishes that ignorance of his order has made a considerable number of men "fanatics," caused them to emit "idle vaporings," and filled them with "the same spirit as existed in the hearts of those who crucified Christ." That's his first averment. His second is: "If they knew, they would ever be dumb from very shame." This puts our Iowa brethren in a sad predicament. If they remain uninformed, they will be "the most ignorant of fanatics," but if they obtain the facts, they will "be dumb from very shame." Their choice is between being fools and "fanatics," or joining the order and so becoming Odd-fellow dummies "from very shame."

The proposition is very simple, but its solution may be too difficult for men who are devoted to "idle vaporings." Since first I became acquainted with the coffined skeleton, and the mummery and blasphemy of initiation, I have suspected the reason why Odd-fellows become dummies; but, so far as I remember, this is the first instance where I have met with the direct assertion by a prominent member that the seal of silence was set upon the lips of the men who know the things done of them in secret "from very shame! Possibly there may be a crumb of comfort for the "cowans" in Eph. 5: 12 and its connections, for it seems they have the same condition in the lodges in Iowa, so that it is still "a shame to speak of those things that are done of them in secret."

I may not call attention to all the incongruities appearing in this assault upon "the most ignorant fanatics" in Iowa, but I want to thank the gentleman for giving us "a true bill" in lodge charity. Referring to the secrecy, he says: "Well, that great bugbear consists of the signs and words by which one brother is able to tell another. They are secret so that no man may receive the benefits which he has not paid for." Precisely so. Just what he has "PAID FOR;" not one feature of benevolence—not one cent in charity. That's precisely what I have been teaching the Odd-fellows of Ontario, but their Grand Master, Jolliffe, "don't take kindly to the idea," and he will probably be "hauling his Iowa brother over the coals" for being so frank and truthful in his statement. If an Iowa Anti, I should appreciate the advice and the exhortation so benignly given in his closing paragraph: "Good people ('having the same spirit that crucified Christ, and the most ignorant of fanatics') cease your senseless prattle, your silly twaddle; go fight the devil and sin all you choose, but don't rant about something of which you know nothing. Go with us and learn the divine lesson of humility, and practice the precept of the golden rule."

FROM NORTH DAKOTA.

Monango, N. D., March, 1894.

Editor Cynosure:—The weather in North Dakota has been unusually mild, for the time of year, for several weeks. Some farmers have, for a week, been seeding wheat. More wheat is now sown than ever before so early in the season, notwithstanding some farmers are holding back for fear of severe weather later on. There will probably be less acreage sown this spring than there was a year ago, owing to the prevalence of the Russian thistle, which seems to be here to stay and it will probably diminish the average yield at least, from 30 to 40 per cent.

Yours truly, (Rev.) G. C. Fait.

FROM REV. H. H. HINMAN.

Marion, Kan., March, 1894.

Editor Cynosure:—I have now been here thirteen days, and have preached every day but one—in all, thirteen sermons. Our meetings have been held in a country schoolhouse, and quite well attended. I have preached simply the Gospel, and have urged the duty of immediate repentance. I have found many obstacles in the way, but mainly that there are so many backslidden Christians. Still, the attention has been excellent, and there is evidently great seriousness. One young woman has professed conversion. Yesterday she gave a good testimony, and we went with her, about two miles, to the Cottonwood river, where I baptized her. March is generally a cool month for immersing, but owing to the long south winds, the water was quite warm. She was received into the church, and we celebrated the Lord's Supper. We had all fairly arrived at home when a fine thunder-shower came down and refreshed the thirsty earth.

The farmers are all very busy in their fields. The sowing of oats is nearly completed. The outlook for crops is fine.

I shall be here possibly a week longer. Yours in Christ, H. H. Hinman.

DEACON INCREASE LEADBETTER.

Weston, Mass., Month 3, Day 10, 1894.

Editor Cynosure:—Peace be unto thee! I am sitting in the presence of a saint of 83 years of age. He bears the name of his father and grandfather who lived and reared their families on this soil. In 1814 our brother was promised, a few months before he was four years old, that if he could read when his next birthday came, he should have a book for a present. He learned to read, and got the book on the day he was four years old.

In his seventeenth year he rose one morning, at 2 o'clock, and shoveled eighteen loads of gravel before 12 o'clock at noon, to assist his father to finish a town contract for grading. He then drank a draught of "black-strap" (rum and molasses) from a bottle. A young man who was working with him thereupon preached temperance to young Increase, and gave him the pledge to sign. He signed it and kept it thenceforward. He was out-and-out against slavery from the first of his recollection. The Morgan affair, in 1826, made him a decided Anti-mason, and the truth has kept him so ever since.

About twenty-five years ago Bro. Drake, pastor of the Congregational church in Wayland, preached on Fast-day, and invited the deacon home with him at noon; and his sister who kept house for her brother invited Bro. Leadbetter to dine with them. They learned that he was accustomed to fast on Fast-day; and they afterwards bore fruit in the same self-denial.

Over yonder in Wellesley, but three miles from here, where Sister Flagg, with her keen pen, leads a great company of women who publish the Gospel, her father Isaac, another aged witness for Christ, carries us back to the year 1807. The occasional sight of these two living monuments of divine mercy and truth is fitted to inspire us younger soldiers to keep alive the testimony of Jesus. Apropos of this power of the works and words of the earlier generations upon those who follow, what fitter service to the political exigencies of this day can the Cynosure render than to reprint the burning, and now prophetic, words of David McFall, uttered more than ten years ago, on "The Political Outlook?"

Bro. Leadbetter's appreciation of things that are excellent receive an illustration from the fact that he copied, with his own trembling hand, into a journal this noble deliverance, notwithstanding his characteristic way of declaring that he does not wield the pen of a ready writer—"A pen is an implement that was never made for my hand to hold."

That he held it to good purpose when he copied Bro. McFall's article, no sensible man who is conversant with the political situation in this country during the past forty years can doubt. I copy a few sentences, in the hope that the Cynosure may soon reproduce the whole.

"The long agony is now over, and Stephen Grover Cleveland—a third-class lawyer, and first-class profligate—becomes the next President of our country. The Democrats are happy, their path to the public crib being now open. They mean to breakfast after a forced abstinence of a quarter of a century. The Independents are independent. They have strained at the gnat and swallowed the camel.....The Prohibitionists are thoughtful, having accomplished more than they intended. The rascals are turned out, and a more rascally set let in, and, as the result of the whole, the country is doomed for a season to turn the grindstone for a booby. The election marks an era in our political history. It is more than the defeat of a party....The Republican party did not fall by a shower of rain, or the rhythmical remark of a venerable clergyman. It fell through its own moral infirmity....It is the old story over again—the birthright sold for a mess of pottage; but this time the pottage was not delivered....No party ever had a wider field before it in which to gather honor. The Indian question offered a problem for Christian statesmanship to solve. So did the Chinese. Mormonism, the twin-sister of slavery in rottenness, despotism, and antagonism to American institutions, called loudly for repressive legislation. So did Freemasonry, with its multitudinous spawn of secret orders. The divine institution of the family demanded protection. A uniform national and scriptural law of marriage and divorce has been a pressing necessity for the last quarter of a century. Our educational system needed, and still needs, defense against the enactments of infidelity and Romanism. Our Christian institutions require preservation and perfecting; and the rum traffic an absolute overthrow. All these were ripe fruit on the tree of life which the Republican party had only to pluck and eat and live forever....The truth is, our entire governmental system needs to be born again. It is infidel. It is corrupt and decaying fast, and the salt of Christianity must be thrown in, or the whole affair will become rank and smell to heaven. Deliverance and salvation can come from no other quarter. Where is the hope of this purifying agency being called in by the Democratic party? Echo answers where?" etc.

These words are as fresh and timely now as in 1883, when they were uttered by the faithful watchman who has since entered into the rest that remaineth for the people of God. Sincerely thy servant in Christ,

WM. F. DAVIS.

The New Volume of Pen and Pencil Series.

WELSH PICTURES Drawn with Pen and Pencil.

By D. Lewis Jones, Morris Jones, Edward Ffoulkes, H. Elvet Lewis, D. Tyssil Evans, D. Davies and O. M. Edwards. Edited by Richard Lovett, M. A. With many Illustrations. Imperial 8vo, cloth, gilt edges, boxed..... 3.20

"'Welsh pictures' is the work of ten Welshmen, among whom illustrating the beauties of Wales has been parcelled out according to the special familiarity of each. The result is a pleasing volume."—London Times.

THE EARTHLY FOOTPRINTS OF OUR RISEN LORD, Illumined.

A continuous narrative of the Four Gospels according to The Revised Version, with introduction by Rev. John Hall, D. D. Illustrated by 113 full-page half tone re-productions. Small 4to, cloth.....net 1.50
Gilt edge, with silk book mark, boxed.....net 2.00
Full morocco, flexible, gilt edges, round corners, boxed.....net 3.75

Pictures reflecting the best in sacred art from Raphael to the present day are scattered profusely through the book.

"To many the life of the Christ will be a new book in this form. Though beyond the introduction it contains no word except what is found in the four Gospels, yet when read continuously, without the breaks necessarily made by the different stories of the four evangelists, the narrative takes on new force and lifelikeness. The very fact that this is not our usual method of reading the Word will give it a new reality."—Golden Rule.

A GIFT OF LOVE, and Loving Greetings for 365 Days.

By Rose Porter. Long 18mo. Paper cloth..... 1.00
White cloth, silver top, in box..... 1.25
Decorated silk, silver top, in box..... 1.75

"'A Gift of Love' is the work of a loving heart. It contains a text of Scripture for every day of the year with the addition of an appropriate thought in poetry of prose all bearing on the theme of love. The work must have called for a great amount of patient toil. But it has not been spent in vain, for the volume will prove a blessing to many a soul. To use it day by day for a year thoughtfully and prayerfully, must result in a rich growth in love on the part of the user. The author is well known and esteemed for her previous works' sake."—The N. Y. Observer.

THE GREAT LONDON DAILIES.

By H. W. Massingham. Profusely illustrated. 12mo, cloth..... 1.00

Very welcome to all who like to look behind the scenes and see how the great London dailies are worked.

New Editions.

The Prayer Meeting and Its Improvement.

By Rev. LEWIS O. THOMPSON. Eighth edition, cloth, $1.25.

"Most heartily do we wish this work a wide circulation, both among pastors and people, and we hope it may do much toward the lifting of the prayer-meeting into that higher place which it ought to hold among the grand instrumentalities in the kingdom of the Master'—Congregationalist.

"We do not remember to have met with a work so suggestive, and we heartily commend it to both pastors and private members."—Baptist Weekly.

The Crisis of Missions. By Rev. ARTHUR T. PIERSON, D. D. Cloth, $1.25; paper, 35c.

"We do not hesitate to say that this book is the most purposeful, earnest, and intelligent review of the mission work and field which has ever been given to the church."—Christian Statesman.

The Christian's Secret of a Happy Life.

By HANNAH WHITALL SMITH. One hundredth thousand. Issued in fourteen styles, from 50c. to $2.50. Send for circular.

"To commend this work would seem almost superfluous; and yet to young Christians who may not know it, we cannot refrain from saying, Buy this book, and keep it with your Bible for constant study, until you have thoroughly mastered, in your own experience, the 'secret' of which it tells. It will transform the dark days of your life, as it has transformed those of thousands before you, into days of heavenly light."—New York Evangelist.

The Topical Text Book. Fourth edition.

16 mo., cloth, 60c.

This little volume is a worker's most useful tool. It collates all Scripture passages under their topical headings, and for this reason proves far more helpful in studying a subject than the best concordance.

"I find one of the very best ways to study the Scripture is to study topically."—D. L. Moody.

Stalker's Life of Christ. Twelfth edition.

Stalker's Life of St. Paul. Fourth edition.

12 mo., cloth, each, 60c.

These works by Professor James Stalker, M. A., are unique in their compact putting of these lives into such condensed form without injurious brevity. They are being taken up as text books by Biblical classes in all parts of the country, thus proving their practical value.

Grace and Truth under Twelve Different Aspects. By W. P. MACKAY, M. A. Paper, 35c.; cloth, 75c. Two hundred and fiftieth thousand.

This remarkable sale can only be attributed to the very practical character of this work as a guide to the inquirer and a work of helpful instruction for the immature Christian. It is of this volume Mr. D. L. Moody said: "I know of no work in print better adapted to place in the hands of the inquirer."

Notes and Suggestions for Bible Readings.

By S. R. BRIGGS. Sixtieth thousand. 8 vo, cloth. $1.00; flexible, 75c.

Edition after edition of this work has been called for until it would seem the demand must be supplied. The sales however, increase rather than otherwise.

Feathers for Arrows. By Rev. C. H. SPURGEON. 16 mo., cloth, $1.00.

Few preachers have made such effective use of pointed illustrations as the well known pastor of the great Metropolitan Tabernacle. Here he has given us a large cluster of his best with liberty to enjoy and employ.

Revell's Record for Church Treasurers.

Size No. 1, $1.50; Size No. 2, $2.00.

Popular because practical—valuable because time saving—the only record for weekly envelope system that reduces the treasurer's work to the minimum.

In Brief.

Statistics show that 23,010,000 inhabitants of the United States are maintained by agriculture; 15,620,000 by commerce, and 11,520,000 by manufactures. —Exchange.

A writer says that whenever a horse driven by him has balked, he has got out of his carriage, gone to the horse's forefoot, lifted it from the ground, and struck the shoe a few blows with a stone. He has never failed to start a balky horse in this very simple way.—New York Observer.

One of the events which show how far we have traveled in the South as well as in the North is the act of the Board of Aldermen and common council of Richmond, Va., who have, with a single dissenting vote, passed an ordinance giving $7,500 for an armory for colored troops in that city. The old inhabitants must think the world is turned upside down. —Independent.

The human family living on earth today consists of about 1,450,000,000 souls—not fewer, probably more. These are distributed literally all over the earth's surface, there being no considerable spot on the globe where man has not a foothold. The extremes of the blacks and whites are as five to three, the remaining 700,000,000 intermediate, brown, yellow and tawny in color.—Anonymous.

There have been gathered 2,500 gallons olives from 1,350 olive trees of J. E. Packard, in this place, this season. The trees are five and six years old, and this is a short year, or rather last year was an off-year for olives in California. Mr. Packard has pickled his fruit, and has a good demand for his olives at a price that will net him fifty cents a gallon, or over $1,200 for his whole crop.—Pomona (Cal.) Progress.

Blackwood's Magazine has studied the military horoscope of 1894 with the following result: Russia has fewer railways than France, Germany, Austria, or Italy. When she would transport her vast army to any field of future action she must begin in time of peace. More than one-half the Russian army is now massed within striking distance of the Triple Alliance. This means war.—Western Watchman.

The Secret of Success.

The great volume of evidence in the form of personal, unpurchased voluntary testimonials, telling in words overflowing with gratitude of what Hood's Sarsaparilla has actually done, prove beyond any possibility of doubt that this great medicine possesses real and extraordinary merit. These letters come from every portion of the country, and they tell of surprising cures of diseases which even physicians had pronounced incurable and after the patients had given up in despair. What is the secret of this great success? Simply this: Hood's Sarsaparilla acts upon the blood, and by making good blood it gives health, strength and happiness. Thus it is that Hood's Sarsaparilla cures when all other preparations fail. This is why you should get Hood's and only Hood's.

"My mother had an abscess from which she recovered after much suffering, but every fall she would have a bilious attack which would last two weeks. Last summer we induced her to try Hood's Sarsaparilla and this fall she had only a slight attack. Hood's has done her much good. I have also taken it with benefit myself." Miss Rose Wagner, Depauville, N. Y.

The following letter is from Mrs. J. B. Nickel, 428 West 49th street, New York City: "I was always troubled with sick headaches and could have nothing done for them. Finally, I concluded to try Hood's Sarsaparilla. After using one bottle I felt much better, and before my second bottle was gone I did not have any pain in my head, so I am entirely cured."

"Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup for Children Teething" softens the gums, reduces inflammation, allays pain and cures wind colic. 25c a bottle.

CURES OTHERS

For Severe, Lingering Coughs, Weak Lungs, Bleeding from Lungs, Bronchitis, Asthma, and Consumption, in its early stages, Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery is a sovereign remedy. It not only cures the cough but also builds up the strength and flesh of those reduced below a healthy standard by "Wasting Diseases." Will not make fat folks more corpulent.

Mr. Wiley.

B. F. Wiley, of Box Elder, Converse Co., Wyo., writes: "I had bronchitis for twenty years and over, and I could not work without coughing so hard as to take all my strength away. I took five bottles of Dr. Pierce's Golden Medical Discovery, and give you my word and honor that I can do any work that there is to do on my 'ranch' without coughing. I have not taken any of the 'Golden Medical Discovery' for a year."

CHICAGO, THURSDAY, MARCH 29, 1894.

THE IOWA "MULCT" SALOON BILL.

The accession of the Republicans to political power in Iowa has resulted in placing the prohibitory law of that State in jeopardy. At least appearances indicate that it will take a secondary position, if it remains unrepealed, so that it will become practically inoperative, provided that the new "mulct" saloon-promoting bill, which passed the lower house of the Legislature last week, shall be pushed to effectiveness.

Reference was made in these columns, some months ago, to the original bill that had then been introduced in the Legislature. Since then it has been revised, until it is now mainly a device to nullify the existing law.

Originally the mulct to be collected from any place selling liquor was placed at $1,000. Now it is to be $600. Any saloon-keeper who pays this sum yearly, at intervals to be fixed by law, is not to be prosecuted under the prohibitory law. That is to say, the saloon-keeper is to pay a license of $600 a year. The money is to be divided equally between the city and the county where it is collected. The law is to be operative in all cities having more than 5,000 inhabitants, and may be applied to towns of less magnitude when 65 per cent of the legal voters give their consent.

In its present form, it is predicted, it will become a law. The Chicago Herald (Democratic) charges it upon the Republicans of Iowa as evidence of "their utter hypocrisy on the liquor question." Had they been honest, it argues, the Republicans would have repealed the present prohibitory law; but they leave it on the books, it adds, to placate the Prohibitionists, "and nullify it by what is in effect a license law, in order that they may get all the liquor they want without annoyance."

A compromise feature of the pending bill is the future submission anew to the people of a prohibitory amendment to the State constitution. It is thought, however, that with the mulct law in full force there will be little difficulty in defeating this amendment at the polls.

A REFORMATION—OR A HOODWINK.

The Deseret News, the official organ of the Utah Mormons, in its issue of March 16, prints a leading editorial, entitled "Saints and Secret Societies," that would fill nearly two and a half columns of the Cynosure. This article is written, professedly, in response to the inquiry: "Is it consistent for a professing Latter-Day Saint (Mormon) to unite with a secret society?" The correspondent who propounds the question also calls attention to "the fact that persons who have membership in the church, some of them influential in the locality where they reside, have taken upon them the obligations, oaths and agreements of certain secret societies, thus becoming members of such organizations."

The answer of the News would afford us quotations through several numbers of the Cynosure, if they were properly weighed and investigated for their true meaning and the sincerity with which they are uttered.

First, in the specifications of its response to its correspondent, the News declares:

> The position of the church on this matter has been clearly defined in the Scriptures, by revelations, both ancient and modern, and by earnest, repeated and consistent instructions from those in authority. It is almost inconceivable that there should be any uncertainty or doubt as to what the rule of the church and the duty of the Saints is in this regard. There has been no change in the revelations, no change in the teachings of the church, and no change that we are aware of in the secret orders and organizations themselves. And yet there appears to be necessity for fresh warning on the subject lest some be unwittingly led into transgression through following the uncondemned example of others.
> Let it be understood, therefore, that those who are numbered with the Latter-Day Saints have no place whatever in any of the secret orders, societies, combinations or unions of the day. The proper and safe course for each member of the church is to leave this class of organizations severely alone.

On the face of it this declaration seems fairly and squarely to meet the question at issue, and in accordance with the principles of antagonism to secret societies for which the Cynosure has so long and earnestly contended.

Visions, however, of the Mormon church at Nauvoo, Ill., largely made up of Freemasons—before the exodus to Utah—and the secrets of the Endowment House and its vile mysteries at Salt Lake City, and the murderous, secret oath-bound Danites—the "avengers" of the Mormon church—somehow cast a shadow of doubt and suspicion upon any declaration against secret societies emanating from the Mormon headquarters.

The foregoing passage, extracted from the Deseret News, contains a remarkable sentence: "There has been no change in the revelations or the teachings of the (Mormon) church, and no change that we are aware of in the secret orders and organizations themselves." Would the editor have us believe that the Mormon church still operates the Endowment House as it once did, or that the Danites and their murderous work have been abolished? Not at all. A further examination of its article shows that its fulminations, like those of the Church of Rome, are not directed towards its own secret associations, but against those which have no affiliation with it. Judging from the context, it is fired with holy zeal in opposition to secular labor-unions, federations of capitalists and employers, and that class of oath-bound fraternities with which business, religious, political and social circles now overabound, all having a similar object—the attainment of superior power and gain for the few against the many.

There are those who believe that Mormonism and the Mormons have changed their policy, if not their religion. Only so far may this belief be nurtured as to include the outward requirements of the United States Courts. There is no reason to believe that otherwise has reformation touched the hearts and lives of these "Saints,"—that they are better Christians, more trustworthy in their principles, or purer in their practices.

We are glad to find them arrayed against any form of secret societies. We wish that they would go further and clean out their own secret mysteries, including the occult ceremonies, annually performed in the lower recesses of the Salt Lake Temple, for the conversion of the dead.

CHANCE-MEDLEY—MALICE—COLLEGE PRANKS.

"Chance-Medley (Chand-Melle)—a hot fray—are expressions borrowed by the law from France, and, in reality, distinct in meaning—the one signifying a casual affray; the other an affray in the heat of blood or passion. Both are, in this country, and in most others, recognized as pleas in mitigation of the offense of homicide." In other words, if, without intending it, one antagonist kills the other in a fight, it is a chance-medley, reducing the crime to simple manslaughter.

"Malice, in law, is not confined to a particular intent of an act to the injury of a particular person, but to a general intent of injury preceding the unlawful act; thus, if one shoot A, intending to shoot B, he is nevertheless guilty of murder with malice prepense. Malice, in law, is divided, for convenience of proof, into express and implied. Express malice is where the defendant's intent to commit the crime is directly proved; implied malice is where the intent to commit the crime is presumed by the law from the facts; and where a defendant is shown to have intended an act, he is presumed to have intended all the consequence of that act. In the law of torts, malice means the unjustifiable commission of an act injurious to another."

These legal distinctions taken in connection with the recent outrage at Cornell University, have especial significance. As already related in the Cynosure, the colored cook at a banquet of the freshmen of the university was killed by chlorine gas introduced into the kitchen, it is supposed, by some of the sophomores, and several of the students at the feast were made sick by the same agency. When the legal investigation of the homicide was begun, Judge G. A. Forbes charged the grand jury at Ithaca as follows: "Gentlemen, you will proceed to the investigation of this case carefully, and you must not proceed with the idea that murder has been committed unless all the facts and circumstances point irresistibly and conclusively to the commission of that crime. Let no man upon the grand jury or off the grand jury think or suppose that any student in that university was so thoughtless and unmindful of human life that a plan was premeditately and deliberately made to kill any person. I do not think that such a thing could be harbored for a single moment; and unless an investigation should point to a deliberate case of murder, to a deliberate undertaking on the part of any one who was connected with that transaction to destroy human life, an indictment in any of the degrees of murder could not be sustained for a single moment, and no conviction could be had with an indictment of that character were one found."

The judge evidently thought that the death of the cook was a "chance-medley," since the sophomores could have had no motive for killing her, and probably no such intention. Thus far his conclusions were possibly right; but the mildness of his charge becomes mere milk-and-water when we take into consideration the fact (quoted above) that "in the law of torts, malice means the unjustifiable commission of an act injurious to another." That was the very crime for which those Cornell sophomores should have been tried and punished; for it is certain that this citation fully covers their action. What adds thinness to the charge of Judge Forbes is his published hint to the jury of a resolution of censure as a sufficient punishment for the misdeeds of the sophomores.

Of course, we understand that to properly control a thousand students in one college is a weighty problem; but in law and equity they should be as amenable for criminal offenses as those who are not students.

THE PAROCHIAL SCHOOL AS AN EDUCATOR.

Mention was made, the other day, of the employment of Roman Catholic nuns as teachers in one of the public schools at Pittsburgh, and the sharp opposition which the action of the local school board encountered. The nuns retained their places for several days, virtually making it a parochial school, pending a legal application by Protestant citizens for an injunction to restrain the board from perpetuating this infliction. The public indignation, however, became so strong that the nuns did not wait for the issue of the injunction, but voluntarily withdrew and opened the regular parochial school on its proper basis in its proper place. Henceforth the public school will maintain its normal position, free from sectarian influences.

While on this subject, it may be well to present some startling statistics, recently compiled by the Inter Ocean, showing the influence of the parochial school as a educator, as follows:

"The foreign-born population of the United States is less than 15 per cent of the whole. In so far as this 15 per cent has been educated at all, it has been educated in parochial schools. This 15 per cent furnishes 26 per cent of the white jail and Bridewell population of the country. The census of 1891 gives the penitentiary population at 28,440; of these 13,715 have been educated in the common schools of America, in so far as they have been educated; 14,725 have been educated, in so far as they have been educated, in European parochial schools, mostly under the management of priests, friars, or nuns. Of the 53,696 inmates of poorhouses, over 51 per cent were of foreign birth, and educated, in so far as they were educated, at parochial schools."

The "Godless public school," as the Romanists term it, cannot compete with such a record as that.

"COXEY'S COMMONWEAL ARMY."

The press has given a vast amount of publicity to the scheme of J. S. Coxey, of Massillon, Ohio, who proposes to march to Washington in company with 100,000 followers, to make two demands upon Congress for the alleged benefit of the people at large.

Since the promulgation of intelligence relating to this movement is so full and wide-spread, sufficient has been here said to pave the way for a brief explanation of its objects, one or both of which will probably fail to impress Congress with their importance or practicability.

Hon. Jeremiah Simpson, Congressman from Kansas, and representing the Farmers' Alliance, has been engaged to present two bills in Congress in furtherance of the demands of the Coxey crusade. One provides for issuing $500,000,000 in legal-tender notes, to be expended by the Secretary of War at the rate of $20,000,000 per month in constructing roads in the various States. Common labor is to be paid for at $1.50 per day, team and labor $3.50, and a day's work is to consist of eight hours. The other bill enacts that any State, Territory, county, township, municipality or incorporated town or village desiring to make any public improvements may deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury non-interest-bearing bonds not exceeding half the assessed valuation of the property in such State, etc., which bonds shall run twenty-five years and be retired at the rate of four per cent a year. Whereupon the Secretary of the Treasury shall issue to the State, etc., giving the bonds, legal tender equal to ninety-nine per cent of their face value, retaining one per cent for printing, engraving, etc.

Coxey, with his "army" of about seventy-five uncouth "unemployed," left Massillon on Sunday and marched to Canton, Ohio, where the men went into Camp—Coxey and his lieutenant, Browne, stopping at a hotel. A blinding snowstorm drove the men out of camp, and forced them to seek shelter in the city jail. The whole scheme has probably ended in a ludicrous failure.

GOVERNMENT FINANCES.

Mr. Bland's bill for the coinage of the "seigniorage" in the United States Treasury, for the purpose of inflating the current circulation of the country, as heretofore described in these columns, passed the United States Senate as well as the House, and now awaits President Cleveland's approval or veto. His purpose, at this writing, is unknown, but his decision must be made public this week. On one hand the bill has many friends; on the other it is strongly opposed. Its provisions are as follows, and the reader can judge for himself its character and the effect that it may have upon the condition of our national finances:

"Section 1. That the Secretary of the Treasury shall immediately cause to be coined as fast as possible the silver bullion held in the Treasury purchased under the act of July 14, 1890, entitled: 'An act directing the purchase of silver bullion, and the issuing of Treasury notes thereon, and for other purposes,' to the amount of the gain or seigniorage of such bullion, to wit: The sum of $55,156,681 and such coin and silver certificates issued thereon shall be used in the payment of public expenditures; and the Secretary of the Treasury may, in his discretion, if the needs of the Treasury demand it, issue silver certificates in excess of such coinage, provided that said excess shall not exceed the amount of the seigniorage as herein authorized to be coined.

"Section 2. After the coinage provided for in the first section of this act the remainder of the silver bullion purchased in pursuance of said act of July 14, 1890, shall be coined into legal tender standard silver dollars as fast as possible, and the coin shall be held in the Treasury for the redemption of the Treasury notes issued in the purchase of said bullion. That as fast as the bullion shall be coined for the redemption of said notes the notes shall not be re-issued, but shall be cancelled and destroyed in amounts equal to the coin held at any time in the Treasury derived from the coinage herein provided for, and silver certificates shall be issued on such coin in the manner now provided by law, provided that this act shall not be construed to change existing law relating to the legal-tender character or mode of redemption of the Treasury notes issued under said act of July 14, 1890. That a sufficient sum of money is hereby appropriated to carry into effect the provisions of this act."

—Professor Whipple, of Wheaton College, in a recent lecture on "Higher Criticism," confined himself to the authorship of the Pentateuch. He showed that those who doubt its Mosaic origin do not believe in God's Word.

—A very gratifying sign of newspaper reform is found in the recent order of the General Manager of the Associated Press to his reporters to "devote less attention to crimes and casualties and more to industrial affairs." Other reforms are needed, but this is a very satisfactory beginning.

—Rev. Samuel F. Porter, who lately returned to Chicago, from an extended tour through Kansas, California, Utah and Nebraska, in good health and spirits, having borne the fatigues of his long journey, at his advanced age, with remarkable vigor, after a brief rest, resumed his missionary work in North Dakota.

—The twenty-sixth annual report of the Evangelical Alliance for the United States, for the year ending January, 1894, is received. It shows gratifying progress and prosperity. Copies may be obtained at the office of the Alliance, 511 United Charities Building, Fourth ave., corner of Twenty-second street, New York City.

—From Hon. D. W. Voorhees, of Indiana, we have received an official copy of the Wilson Tariff bill, as it passed the lower house of Congress, February 1, 1894. Its early passage, with amendments, by the Senate, is expected. It is quite a voluminous pamphlet, and one whose influence for good or evil may yet be sharply realized should it become a law.

—A brick-making firm in this county was recently hindered in business by a strike of its employes, mostly non-union men. It would seem that on this account, in part, their reasonable demands for increased remuneration were met by the firm. To the credit of the men, it is stated, they steadfastly resisted all persuasions to unite with oath-bound labor unions, or to form an independent one, preferring steady work and freedom to the tyranny of the lodge. Other brickmakers, belonging to the unions, are still out.

—In the case of Gov. Waite, of Colorado, whose insane political fervor in behalf of certain appointees resulted in calling to Denver all the State militia and a force of Federal troops, to enforce his demands and insure an "armed peace," the supreme court has remanded the legal phases of the affair to a lower State tribunal for adjudication. The supreme court severely denounced the governor for his injudicious call for the militia, and characterized it as "a dangerous exercise of arbitrary power, tending to anarchy and despotism."

—Following the example of the Province of Ontario, Can., the government of the Province of Nova Scotia has also introduced a bill in the local legislature to order a prohibition plebiscite at the approaching elections. The province has eighteen counties, in sixteen of which there is practically prohibition now. Liquor can legally be sold in only two counties and in the city of Halifax. The measure before the legislature will probably be adopted, and the anticipated result is complete suppression of the liquor traffic throughout the entire province.

—John Halberstadt, secretary of Court Wisconsin, No. 87, Independent Order of Foresters, at Racine, Wis., was arrested last week, at the instance of the High Secretary of the order in Wisconsin. The charge against him is soliciting persons to become members of the I. O. F. of the State of Illinois, which is rated as an insurance company not authorized to transact business in Wisconsin. The case excites more than ordinary interest, as there are in Wisconsin, it is alleged, 1,000 or more Foresters under the jurisdiction of the order in Illinois.

—In California and Washington church property is taxed for the public benefit. On this subject a San Francisco paper remarks that "if all churches taught nothing except what was to the interest of the citizen and of the State, it might be easier to show the wisdom of no tax on church property. But when a church which devotes itself to amassing millions of dollars' worth of property teaches that the mandate of a foreigner 'should be obeyed sharp as the click of a trigger' and attempts to overthrow free speech, it is not so easy to see why its tax should be remitted."

—We are in receipt of the Sunday-School Weekly, a new venture, which the publishers design to make a firstclass paper for home reading. Among its special contributors we notice the names of Pres. Chas. A. Blanchard, of Wheaton College, and Mrs. Abbie C. Morrow, editor of the Illustrator. The proprietors are also competent writers upon Sunday-school topics, and will undoubtedly endeavor to make it an attractive and useful visitor to its subscribers. Terms, 60 cents a year; 30 cents for six months; trial subscription, 10 cents. Address, Chas. H. Rawson Co., 108 Franklin street, Chicago.

—We are indebted to Mark L. Crawford, Superintendent of the House of Correction of the city of Chicago, for the twenty-second annual report of the Board of Inspectors of the institution for the year 1893. At the beginning of that year there were 1,137 inmates. During that year there were received, altogether, 10,109 inmates, an increase of 747 above the entries of the previous twelve months. Of these the city police courts sent 9,478, the Cook county criminal courts, 228, justices of the peace, 374, and towns and villages, 29. The number remaining in the prison at the beginning of the year 1894 was 1,024. Some beneficial reforms are recommended.

—Referring to the Inter-Ocean's charges that Mayor Hopkins is discharging Freemasons from city employment, the Wheaton College Record observes:

> If we were certain that the places being vacated by these persons would be supplied by persons who are not under secret obligations to any portion of the community, we should commend it most heartily. If he means to fill their places with those who are under secret obligations to another party rather than the Masonic lodge, there will be no essential gain. Men who hold office and draw their living from the public should never be under secret obligation to any portion of their fellow-citizens. Their relations are such that they should never be hampered by any grips, signs, or tokens given, handed, sent, or thrown by lodge or sect. Of course all intelligent persons understand that the Masonic lodge has for years been filling up public offices with its members, or rather Freemasons have been using their Masonry to obtain the positions which they desired. In the end there must be reaction. We shall be glad to see it come.

treating a subject negatively as by treating it positively. These people expressed great appreciation of our discourse, though they were afraid to have me lecture on the lodge question, in their church. They were free to grant the use of their church, some time ago, to a man to lecture on the "End of Time," and "The Second Coming of Christ." They are not afraid of speculative themes, but when it comes to practical subjects they shrink.

This reminds me of the man who attended the preaching of a popular city pastor for six months. After listening to an eloquent Sunday evening discourse on the theme of the "Recognition of Friends in Heaven," the gentleman walked up and congratulated the pastor on the fine discourse, and then said: "Pastor, I most heartily agree with the discourse this evening; and I now suggest that you preach on the subject of recognition here, for I have attended this church for six months, and no one has yet recognized me." My application is that we had better be getting people ready for the end of time and Christ's coming. If Christ comes and finds his church so in league with the world as it now is, woe be to many who think they are ready.

Last Sunday was my regular day at Plainview, in Linn county. I spoke in the morning on "The True Israelite," founded on John 1:47. At night I spoke of "John the Baptist as a Reformer"—text, Luke 3:18. These services prepared the way for the lecture on Monday evening, on the lodge question. This had been announced for one month. Notwithstanding the immense storm, we had a very good audience. Quite a number of lodge-men were present. I started out by kindly requesting them to correct me in case I should misstate anything, as my object is to present only facts. No one offered a criticism, but all were very attentive. The meeting was a grand success.

Men who were members of the orders came up at the close and said to me: "I see the thing now in a new light. There is no charity or benevolence about the lodges, and they are certainly Christless in their religious worship." The meeting was certainly an eye-opener to many.

Before the lecture, some lodge-men asked such questions as this: "What can he say against the lodges?" "What can any man find against these orders?" They were at no loss to know, at the close of the address. The questions were seemingly answered. It is thought that the address at Shedd's, and this one at Plainview, are the only lectures ever delivered in the county against secret societies. I think they will not be the last, if we should live.

Some of my members were a little shaky as to the results of the lecture before it came off, but they flocked about me and gave their strongest approval. Here are some of the best people I have ever met. It is one of the drawbacks to the itinerant system to have to break off from such kind parishioners and go out again among strangers. I trust they may be favored with a much better pastor next year. P. B. WILLIAMS.

THE HOME.

THE SIFTING OF PETER.

In St. Luke's Gospel we are told
How Peter in the days of old
Was sifted;
And now, though ages intervene,
Sin is the same, while time and scene
Are shifted.

Satan desires us, great and small,
As wheat to sift us, and we all
Are tempted;
Not one, however rich or great,
Is by his station or estate
Exempted.

No house so safely guarded is
But he, by some device of his,
Can enter;
No heart hath armor so complete
But he can pierce with arrows fleet
Its center.

For all, at last, the cock will crow,
Who hear the warning voice but go
Unheeding;
Till thrice or more they have denied
The Man of Sorrows, crucified
And bleeding.

One look of that pale, suffering face
Will make us feel the deep disgrace
Of weakness;
We shall be sifted till the strength
Of self-conceit be changed at length
To meekness.

Wounds of the soul, though healed, will ache,
The reddening scars remain, and make Confession;
Lost innocence returns no more;
We are not what we were before
Transgression.

But noble souls through dust and heat
Rise from disaster and defeat
The stronger;
And, conscious still of the divine
Within them, lie on earth supine
No longer.

A BEAUTIFUL INCIDENT.

BY MRS. VICTORIA ALEXANDRA STONE.

It is not in the power of people in the common walks of life to do good to the extent which is possessed by sovereigns whose sway extends over millions of their subjects. People may think that kings and sovereigns in general deserve no credit for the good that they do, simply because it is in their power to do good. Very true; but we should remember that it is also in their power to do much harm, as the reign of Henry VIII., and Bloody Mary of England, bear ample witness. I have read many instances of the kindness of heart of Victoria of England, and one incident that I read many years ago, I write from memory for the boy and girl readers of the Cynosure.

The incident in question is especially deserving of note, because the person thus honored belonged to the humblest class. He was a poor man, whose family were dependent upon his earnings for their daily bread. Briefly narrated, the story is as follows:

About fifteen or twenty years ago there lived near London a young man whom we will call George Sherwood. His family consisted of himself, his wife, and two adopted children—a boy of eight and a girl of five years. The boy he took from a foundling hospital, and the girl he picked up in the streets of London. The mere fact that he adopted those two children proved that the man possessed a noble nature, but he trod his daily path of life meekly, and, very likely, the world would never have heard of him but for the following incidents:

One day the house of a near neighbor took fire, and it being a windy day and the house very old, it burned rapidly. All attempts to extinguish the flames were in vain, and the people were standing helplessly about, watching it burn, when a scream from a woman alarmed them all. Her daughter, a girl of twelve years, was in an upper chamber! Help seemed impossible, as the house was one vast sheet of flame; but George Sherwood, who was present, seized a light ladder, placed it against the porch, climbed to a window, and soon had the girl in his arms; but, alas! when he descended the frail ladder it broke beneath their weight, and young Sherwood was badly injured, having his right arm broken and his left hip fractured.

For three months he was helpless, suffering agonies from his injuries; but at last he was so far recovered as to be able to work, although he was lame for life. He did not seem to think that he had done anything worthy of note, but worked industriously for the support of those he loved.

But at last one of the Queen's officers heard his story, and in the next list of the names to be knighted by the Queen occurred the name of George Sherwood. The officer sat by the table with the Queen as she read the list which was to receive her approval and signature.

"Who is this?" she said, as she read George Sherwood's name. The officer told his story substantially as we have related it here. The Queen was much moved. She laid down her pen and listened with intense interest.

"And you say this man has never received any reward?"

"Never, your majesty."

The Queen rose to her feet. "To-day is a holiday in Sydenham; bring him here!"

The voice of royalty was obeyed. A vast crowd was congregated in Sydenham. The troops paraded, the bands played, flags waved, and fountains flashed and sparkled in the sun. A platform was erected in the park, around which a crowd assembled. It was guarded by a company of soldiers. Suddenly, at the blast of a bugle, a curtain was lifted, and a lady dressed in black stepped forward upon the platform. It was Queen Victoria. She paused a moment, and, amid a breathless silence, two soldiers stepped upon the platform leading between them a pale, slender young man, who halted in his gait. It was George Sherwood. They led him to the Queen and then stood aside; a lord-in-waiting placed a heavy sword in the Queen's hands, and then she spoke for the first time to the young man, George Sherwood, who stood trembling before her.

"Kneel," she said, and he obeyed. She raised the heavy sword and struck him upon the shoulder.

"Rise, Sir George," she said. She dropped the sword and beckoned towards the curtain.

A lord-in-waiting stepped forward with a box in his hand. He raised the cover and the Queen lifted from its depths an object which was rather insignificant to look at, and yet, for its sake, torrents of blood had been shed, thousands of men had fallen in battle, and deeds of valor without number had been enacted on sea and battle-plain. It was the Cross of the Legion of Honor. She turned once more to George Sherwood and said: "Kneel again." He knelt, and she stooped and pinned the cross upon his breast; then, taking him by the hand, she raised him to his feet, and said: "The Queen has heard with pleasure of your valor, Sir George; such courage should not go unrewarded." The people cheered and the music burst forth, and, no doubt, thousands of hearts responded to the prayer, which was the burden of the hymn that the bands played that day: "God Save the Queen!"

Steamburgh, N. Y.

"JUST AS I AM, WITHOUT ONE PLEA."

More than a half century ago, in the year 1836, a young girl, Miss Charlotte Elliot, was preparing for a grand ball, to be given in her native town. Full of gay anticipation, she started out one day to her dressmaker, to have a fine dress fitted for the occasion. On her way she met her pastor, an earnest, faithful man, and in the greetings which passed between them he learned her errand. He reasoned and expostulated, and finally pleaded with her to stay away from the ball. Greatly vexed, she answered, "I wish you would mind your own business!" and went on her wayward course.

In due time the ball came off; and this young girl was the gayest of the gay. She was flattered and caressed; but after dancing all night, laying her weary head on her pillow only with returning light, she was far from happy. In all the pleasures there had been a thorn, and now conscience made her wretched. Her pastor had always been a loving, cherished friend, and her rudeness to him rankled in her breast. More than all, the truth of his words came to her heart and would give her no rest. After three days of misery, during which life became almost insupportable, she went to the minister with her trouble, saying:

"For three days I have been the most wretched girl in the world, and now, oh, that I were a Christian! I want to be a Christian! What must I do?"

We need not be told that the pastor freely forgave her for her rudeness to himself, nor that he joyfully directed her to the true source of peace.

"Just give yourself, my child, to the Lamb of God just as you are."

This was a new Gospel to her; she had never comprehended it before.

"What! Just as I am?" she asked. "Do you know that I am one of the worst sinners in the world? How can God accept me just as I am?"

"That is exactly what you must believe," was the answer. "You must come to him just as you are."

The young girl felt overwhelmed as the simple truth took possession of her mind. She went to her room, knelt down, and offered God her heart, guilty and vile as it was, to be cleansed and made fit for his own indwelling. As she knelt, peace—full, overflowing—filled her soul. Inspired by the new and rapturous experience, she then and there wrote the hymn beginning:

"Just as I am, without one plea,
But that Thy blood was shed for me,
And that Thou bid'st me come to Thee,
O Lamb of God, I come."

Little did Charlotte Elliot think of fame, or of the immortality of the words she had written. It was simply putting her heart on paper; and therefore the hymn, born of a mysterious experience, appeals to other hearts needing the cleansing power of the blood of the Lamb.

Charlotte was possessed of literary gifts, and when the editor of "Literary Remembrances" died, she took charge. In making up her first number, she inserted several of her own poems anonymously; among them was "Just as I Am." It immediately attracted attention, was widely copied, and passed into the hymnology of the Christian church.

This hymn has given consolation to millions of anxious people. Like the author, many think they are too vile to come to God, but must wait until they have become better. In the hymn Miss Elliot expresses the true way of coming, "just as I am." This is the way to come acceptably to God.—Reformed Church Record.

"A GENIUS FOR HELPING FOLKS."

"There is a man," said his neighbor, speaking of a village carpenter, "who has done more good, I really believe, in this community than any man who ever lived in it. He cannot talk very well in prayer-meeting, and he doesn't often try. He isn't worth two thousand dollars, and it is very little he can put down on subscription papers for any other object. But a new family never moves into the village that he does not find them out, to give them a neighborly welcome, and offer any little service he can render. He is usually on the outlook to give strangers a seat in his pew in church. He is always ready to watch with a sick neighbor, and look after his affairs for him; and I've sometimes thought he and his wife kept house-plants in winter just for the sake of being able to send little bouquets to invalids. He finds time for a pleasant word for every child he meets, and you'll always see them climbing into his one-horse wagon when he has no other load. He really seems to have a genius for helping folks in all sorts of common ways, and it does me good, every day, just to meet him on the streets."—Christian Observer.

CHRISTIAN TESTIMONY.

I often wish I could remember all the beautiful and striking things that are uttered in the experience meeting. What a book that would make, which contained the brief sayings of God's people, spoken at a time when the heavens touch the earth, hearts are melted and souls on fire.

A young lady who, self-convicted, had removed a ring from her hand, said that her heart felt as pure as her finger.

Another who had been terribly buffeted and cast down by Satan in her effort to find the blessing of holiness said: "I suddenly determined I would smile for God, and that was a couple of days ago; and now," she added, with her face shining with joy and covered with smiles, "I have been smiling ever since."

Another lady said: "I used to look outside to see my Saviour, and often on looking in my heart I would find Satan; but now whenever I look in my heart I see my Saviour, and I have to look outside to see the devil."

I am continually made to marvel at the things upon which is made to hinge the reception of the blessing of sanctification by different people.

One lady had been in prayer for days without experiencing relief, when a friend whispered to her, "Quit praying now and go to believing." She did so, and the next instant the blessing swept into her soul.

Another lady said she had been busy for days putting different things on the altar, when suddenly it occurred to her to put herself. She did so, and at once the sanctifying fire fell.

Still another who had met with great difficulties in coming to the meeting, looking up to God, said: "Lord, I will come and serve you while I have feet to walk," and instantly the blessing filled her soul.—Dr. B. Carradine, in Kentucky Methodist.

YOU WILL NEVER BE SORRY

For living a white life.
For doing your level best.
For being kind to the poor.
For looking before leaping.
For your faith in humanity.
For hearing before judging.
For being candid and frank.
For thinking before speaking.
For harboring clean thoughts.
For discounting the tale-bearer.
For being loyal to the preacher.
For standing by your principles.
For stopping your ears to gossip.
For the influence of high motives.
For asking pardon when in error.
For being as courteous as a duke.
For bridling a slanderous tongue.
For being generous with an enemy.
For being square in business deals.
For sympathizing with the oppressed.
For giving an unfortunate fellow a lift.
For being patient with cranky neighbors.
For promptness in keeping your promises.
For the dollars you have given to missions.
For putting the best possible construction upon the doings of others.—Epworth Herald.

SUNDAY READING AND CONSCIENCE.

In a Boston boarding-house roomed sixteen clerks, honest and well-disposed, and belonging to good families. All of them were of the age when the boy, just merging into manhood, generally makes decisions as to his conduct that result in final good or evil.

Three of the young men, who occupied one of the rooms together, were recent acquaintances, and their first Sunday morning in the house brought a trial of moral courage which is interesting to relate.

The hours between breakfast and church time must be whiled away somehow, and two of the room-mates busied themselves with miscellaneous reading.

The third felt a desire to take out his Bible and read it, as he had been taught to do at home. Fearing ridicule, he hesitated a good while, but conscience presently impelled him to go to his trunk and lift the lid. Cowardice suggested that it would look "sanctimonious" to be seen reading the Bible. He shut the lid down and walked away.

After nearly half an hour of struggle, conscience triumphed again. He rose and went to the trunk a second time. His hand was on the Bible. Again his courage failed him. As he was turning away, one of his companions called out:

"What's the matter, Ike? You're as uneasy as a weathercock."

Ike laughed, and told the truth like a man. To his surprise both the others confessed that they had had the same struggle and defeat. Each thought that he ought to read his Bible, but was afraid to be seen by the rest.

The next minute all three had their Bibles in their hands, and read them together during the next half hour. They agreed to do this every Sunday. The ice was broken.

The next Sabbath morning, while they sat quietly reading, two of the clerks from another room came in.

"Hullo!" they exclaimed. "What is this, a conventicle?"

The three Bible readers frankly told of their agreement. The visitors confessed that only cowardice had kept them, too, from the same duty. They promised to begin at once, and they did so. The example spread, till each of the sixteen clerks in the house spent his Sunday mornings reading the Bible.

Everyone of these youths is to-day a useful man. We cannot, of course, say that the mere reading of the Bible on those Sabbath mornings made these men what they are. We can say, however, that the principles of the Bible must have influenced their lives for good, and the associations which, with such a habit, they would naturally seek, must necessarily have been honorable and elevating, and have tended to their success in life. One of them, who afterward became a minister, related the facts we have given.

One boy's courage to do right may determine not only his own future well-being, but that of many others besides.—Youth's Companion.

THE GLORIOUS COMING.

Oh, weary laborers in the field,
Hope on and sing, nor heave a sigh;
The happy day is drawing near,
"The glorious coming draweth nigh!"

Work on and spread the precious news,
Proclaim it wide to low and high;
Be swift the Master's call to heed,
"The glorious coming draweth nigh!"

Gird on thy armor for the strife,
Go forth and on thy God rely;
Turn not, nor falter, but trust on,
"The glorious coming draweth nigh!"

Be strong, be true, go far and wide,
Till all shall Jesus magnify;
Be holy, spotless, like thy Lord,
"The glorious coming draweth nigh!"

Then hasten to the harvest fields,
The days are passing swiftly by;
The "little while" will soon be gone,
"The glorious coming draweth nigh!"

TEMPERANCE.

A PROHIBITIONIST PERSECUTED.

A dispatch from Fond du Lac, Wis., March 18, furnishes the following narrative:

Rev. William Clark took charge of the Division Street M. E. Church at Fond du Lac in 1892. He was naturally a Prohibitionist from principle, and did not dream that he was bringing a storm about his ears when he accepted an invitation to deliver a prohibitionist speech in Fond du Lac. It was outside of all church work, and he spoke because the prohibition leaders wanted him to deliver a series of addresses. This was in the midst of the Presidential campaign, and if his speaking had any political bearing, it was directly in line with the sentiments of the Methodist conference.

But there happened to be in the membership of Pastor Clark's church a Republican politician named Elihu Colman. Mr. Colman believed that he had the interests of the Republican party at heart and so he expostulated with Pastor Clark. The preacher defended himself and found fault with Mr. Colman for making Republican speeches. Mr. Colman had been United States district attorney under President Harrison's administration and worked industriously for the success of his party. Mr. Colman called to his aid other Republican members of the church. They were N. C. Griffin, M. D. Moore and F. R. Shepard. These men were strong supporters of the Division Street church in a financial way. Mr. Colman and his three friends finally decided to oust him from the church. The preacher became cautious, because he knew that every word of his sermons would be used against him if they could be construed into an accusation. More than 90 per cent of the congregation supported the preacher because they did not care if he did occasionally refer to prohibition.

When it was suggested that on Dec. 17, 1893, a semi-centennial celebration should be held to commemorate the passing of the half century mark of the history of Methodism in Fond du Lac, Mr. Colman and his three friends refused to take part in the exercises and the breach widened.

Among those who took sides with the preacher was W. W. Collins, a merchant. Elihu Colman was the superintendent of the Sunday-school and W. W. Collins was a teacher. One day Mr. Colman called an informal meeting and declared Collins no longer a teacher. The letter of notification was mailed late Saturday night. Sunday morning Collins appeared to teach his class and was told that he had been thrown out. He naturally objected, and there was a squabble before the children of the Sunday-school. It turned out that the meeting called to oust Collins from the Sunday-school was not legal according to the rules of the church.

Mr. Colman and his friends decided to throw the fighting parson out of the ministry, and prepared a long list of charges. The preacher's friends now arrayed themselves against what they believed to be a persecution, and a petition was circulated to offset the influence of Mr. Colman and his friends. Nearly every member of the congregation had become an outspoken advocate of the preacher's cause. A long petition was sent to Bishop Joyce at Nashville, Tenn., signed by fully 90 per cent of the congregation.

Colman's charges against Pastor Clark accused him of immorality, crime and many other things. The charges were principally in the headlines, however, for in the body of the complaint it was only alleged that Pastor Clark delivered political speeches from the pulpit. Bishop Joyce sent Presiding Elder Walker to settle the disturbance, but Mr. Walker immediately removed Mr. Clark from the pulpit and assumed the duties of the office himself.

The preacher sent for Attorney E. W. Chafin, of Waukesha, who declared the charges to be a flimsy pretext and unworthy of notice. But they had done their work and Pastor Clark was shorn of his authority by being taken out of the pulpit.
